

E 12598

THE INTELLIGENT MAN'S GUIDE TO JEW-BAITING

THE INTELLIGENT MAN'S
GUIDE TO JEW-BAITING

by GEORGE SACKS

LONDON
VICTOR GOLLANCZ LTD
1935

CONTENTS

Do we Hate the Jews ?	page 9
The Case for Anti-Semitism	24
The Failure of Assimilation	36
Aryans, Nordics, Hundred Percenters, and Such-like	52
Conflicts of Nationalism	68
Zionism	99
Things—not Men	122
The Cockpit	145
“ The Tragic Cycle ”	157
The Laboratory	180
New Messiahs for Old ?	205

DO WE HATE THE JEWS?

I MAKE NO APOLOGY for adding another book to the long list which the study of anti-Semitism has inspired. For one thing, the greater part of what has been written forms no real contribution to the subject and, for another, I hold that the relations between Jews and non-Jews are an acid test of the stability of political institutions. Anti-Semitism is not just a quaint aberration of the human intellect. It has its roots in social structure, and an examination of its peculiarities sheds a great deal of light on the pathology of modern society. To relegate the whole affair to the intellectual dust-heap of semi-mysticism and to explain it on grounds of instinctive prejudice is to stultify one's self. There is no problem in race relationship which cannot yield to rational observation and scientific consideration.

If, after a dispassionate survey, the conclusion is reached that Jew and Gentile are inherently incapable of resolving their differences—that, in other words, there are ingrained characteristics in one or both of the contestants that make it impossible for them to live together in peace—then race suicide for the Jews, as the smaller group, becomes logically the only way of escape from a hostile world. Driven to this despairing conclusion, one Jewish writer, Mr. L. B. Namier, has seriously discussed the advisability of rigid birth control for Jews, so that their “determined exit” may rid the world of an irreconcilable element. It is to disprove the necessity for such extravagance that this study has been undertaken.

DO WE HATE THE JEWS?

Recent events in Germany have served to focus attention on the problem of the Jews and have been responsible, among other things, for a number of ill-informed treatises on the subject. If the Nazi antics have done nothing else, they have made the rest of the world uncomfortably aware that a Jewish question does exist. It would be wrong, however, to lay undue emphasis on happenings in Germany, for that would be encouraging the view that they were merely the bizarre accompaniments of an otherwise conventional revolution, whereas, in reality, they are part and parcel of a world process.

In his book, The Jew To-day, Mr. Sidney Dark expresses the view that “there is no universal anti-Jewish feeling in the world.” Anti-Semitism, he maintains, is alien to British national character, and certainly it was the fashion up to recent times to decry talk of anti-Semitism. In English-speaking countries it was considered not to exist. Such anti-Jewish prejudice as was present lay beneath the surface. To speak openly of a Jewish problem was as much bad form as to discuss the state of one's vegetative organs in public. For their part, British Jews were quite willing to co-operate in this polite fashion. They tended to behave as though Judaism were merely another branch of British Nonconformity. In his book, The Jews, Hilaire Belloc records with some irritation the difficulty of airing a grievance against them because of this conspiracy of silence. The traditional courtesy of the Englishman forbade him to study the position of the Jew in a country where so many Jews and Jewesses had been absorbed into its ruling classes. And when at length restrictions against immigration of Jews became necessary, legislation was enacted, not against the Jew, but against the modern euphemism for Jew—the "alien."

DO WE HATE THE JEWS?

There are, at the time this book is being written, three separate Fascist groups in England. Two of these, in reply to a questionnaire, have declared their uncompromising hostility towards Jews. Sir Oswald Mosley's group alone professes to have no anti-Semitic bias. It is interesting to note in this connection that, shortly after his visit to Oxford, a Fascist branch was formed; about the same time, perhaps by coincidence, there began the ragging of Jewish students, and the pasting of labels on the doors of their rooms, reading "Down with the Jews," "The Jews are the enemies of the human race," "The Jews control the Press, the cinema, and the wireless." It is of some significance that these movements, which at present are most vocal at street corners, but which by the time this appears may have attained the dignity of Governmental authority, never cease to point out at their meetings that Jews hold key positions in the Government, in the League of Nations, in finance and commerce, out of all proportion to their numbers. Jews in England number 300,000—that is, less than 1 per cent of the population—and in many ways this comparatively small number accounts for certain differences in the Jewish situation in England. It is important, however, to note the objections which have been raised to Jewish penetration in finance, commerce, the professions, and Parliament, for it follows closely the propaganda used by the Nazis in Germany, and it illustrates an aspect of the problem to which I shall later have occasion to refer.

DO WE HATE THE JEWS?

A great deal of what may be termed sub-rosa anti-Semitism undoubtedly exists in England. It is unusual to find a reference to a Jewish character in English fiction which is not in the Shylock tradition. It is the rarest thing to find a Hebraic character presented in a normal light. Englishmen may well be forgiven if they imagine that all Jews have hooked noses, curled oily hair, lisp, wear enormous diamonds in their shirt-fronts, and periodically burn down their business premises. No one who appreciates the power of the printed word can dismiss this as frivolous. If you go on insisting long enough that all Jews are wealthy, their gains ill-gotten by battenning on meek Gentiles, you have gone a long way towards establishing an ineradicable impression that these are characteristics of the Jew. The invocation of the blessed word "Einstein" in reply makes as little impression as the word Mesopotamia in similar circumstances.

DO WE HATE THE JEWS?

Anti-Semitism need not confine itself to bludgeonings of Jews, or to starving them slowly out of the economic life of a country. It is as potently expressed in social barriers erected against admission to clubs and in difficulties raised against occupation of privileged positions. In Great Britain and in the Dominions it is true to say that a Jew will not receive a public appointment on equal merits with a non-Jew. There are hospitals in London, some of them heavily endowed with Jewish money, where every effort is made to keep Jews from positions as house surgeons and from staff appointments.

"I was at Islington," writes Mr. H. J.

DO WE HATE THE JEWS?

Massingham in Time and Tide, "when the procession of thirty thousand Jews marched past me to hold their protest meeting against the atrocities of the Hitler régime. Personally I am free from the anti-Semitic virus, and I feel that the hideous persecution of Jewry in modern moral Germany has restored the Jew from parasitism to the nobler part of a martyred people. Yet, as they marched along the hot and wearisome street, awkwardly and self-consciously keeping step, and many a sly, alert, predacious, rather vulgar face like another, I became conscious of racial prejudices stirring sleepily within me, and I was surprised at a sense of ridicule making a prominent response to the indignant parade before me. And I disliked the marching Jews because they made me feel ashamed of myself." Not once or twice in England's story has this sleepy stirring of old racial prejudices shown itself in violence, and there is no real reason, given the same circumstances, why it should not do so again.

Mr. Dark prefers to believe that hatred of the Jew can find no place in English life. Because most of the distinguished Jews whom he has met do not appear to have suffered any disability by reason of their Judaism, he assumes that dislike and suspicion of the Jew scarcely exist. A rapid survey of the position of modern Jewry suffices, however, to show that what is present in England in lesser degree prevails throughout the world where Jews are congregated in appreciable numbers.

DO WE HATE THE JEWS?

Anti-Semitism in America assumes cruder shape than in England. Messrs. Heywood Brown and George Britt, in their book, Christians Only, have made something of a study of the way in which anti-Jewish prejudice manifests itself in restrictions on the admission of Jewish students to universities, and in their social ostracism. They produce statistics and figures which prove conclusively that many universities practise a modified numerus clausus, that Jewish students do not receive equal consideration in appointments and positions after graduation, and that, in medicine particularly, many have to leave the country to procure a diploma. The slightly ridiculous Greek letter societies, which seem to be a feature of American universities, and membership of which is apparently sought after by the undergraduates, rigidly exclude Jewish members. Smart hotels make a point of barring Jews. Many of them say so in their advertisements. Fashionable resorts frown upon any attempt by wealthier Jews to invade their sacrosanct domains. There are residential areas in New York where estate agents will not let apartments to Jews, maintaining that by so doing they will lower the rental value of the district.

DO WE HATE THE JEWS?

Mr. Mencken, whose case is an interesting one to students of the pathology of the thought process, very nearly precipitated a minor riot recently when, in writing of the Jews, he said : " The Jews could be put down very plausibly as the most unpleasant race ever heard of. As commonly encountered they lack most of the qualities that make the civilised man : courage, dignity, incorruptibility, ease, confidence. They have vanity without pride, voluptuousness without taste, and learning without wisdom. Their fortitude, such as it is, is wasted upon puerile objects and their charity is mainly only a form of display."

We are so accustomed to the spectacle of Mr. Mencken destroying an institution on paper at one moment, and in the next reproving those who agree with him, that it is not surprising to hear that no one in America poured greater ridicule upon that weird manifestation of American backveld nationalism, the Ku Klux Klan, than he did, though the avowed aim of this strange society was to free America from the alien influence of Jew, Catholic, and negro.

Zangwill looked upon America as a country presenting the most favourable conditions for a gigantic experiment in mass-assimilation. These pious aspirations of a gradual absorption of the Jew into the conglomeration of races which mingled in pioneer America, and their fusion into a new race with a brand-new religion vaguely embracing the tenets of both Christianity and Judaism, were destined to end in disappointment. The teeming Jewish ghettos in the large American cities, chiefly New York and Chicago, with wretchedly paid workers crowding its tenements, presented to the older inhabitants a picture of an alien unassimilable element as strange as it was alarming. Alarming, because the immigrant swarms from Poland and Lithuania naturally enough settled amongst their compatriots and drifted into the same trades, chiefly those of the clothing and garment category. New York, being the usual port of arrival, seemed to overflow with Jews, speaking a different language, given to strange outlandish customs, and pushing aggressively into the life of the new America. The development of large-scale capitalism appeared to yield boundless opportunities for the absorption of ever-increasing numbers of immigrants from Europe, and in a short time official figures for the population of New York showed that one in three was a Jew. True, an extensive influx of other strains—Italians, Poles, and Irish—presented similar features to the Jewish invasion. Colonial America—that is to say, the older section of the population—regarded them with the same element of fear, distrust, and dislike.

DO WE HATE THE JEWS?

DO WE HATE THE JEWS?

Dissatisfaction with the policy of the open door led to the passing in 1924 of laws restricting immigration into America. And quota limitations were made, aiming specifically at keeping out Jews from Southern and Eastern Europe, an area which supplied the vast majority of Jewish immigrants.

The most recent development is the formation of a Fascist squad—the “Silver Shirts” (America has always had an amiable weakness for silver). The only coherent item in the programme of this faction appears to be a determination to rid the country of the Jew.

The picture of modern Jewish life in America is typical of the lot of the Jew in quasi-liberal States. Within certain limits there are few legal disabilities, but free and unhampered development of the individual Jew is constantly hindered by the numerous psychological traumata which are the result of distrust and dislike of a racial minority.

The intensity of feeling against the Jew in Germany has astonished most observers, even those who have endeavoured to whitewash the Nazi crudities as regrettable but inevitable accompaniments of a revolutionary upheaval. The problem in Germany involves not only the very existence of 600,000 people, but, by its repercussions, the dignity and self-respect of 16 million others spread over the globe.

DO WE HATE THE JEWS?

Austria has been the scene of much virulent anti-Semitism, and the resistance offered to the spread of Nazi doctrines in Austria has not extended to the protection of its Jews. The group once headed by the late Dr. Dollfuss holds views similar to the Germans on the subject of Jews, and restrictions against admission of Jewish students to universities have long been in existence. The recent civil war has emphasised the precarious position of Austrian Jews. Already Jewish doctors and Jews engaged in official positions have been dismissed, even though many of these had no connection with the hated Social-Democratic Party.

Central Europe in general is no haven of refuge for the Jew. Rumania, Bulgaria, and Serbia have had an unenviable notoriety for virulent anti-Semitism these many years.

France, the first country to emancipate the Jew, has been by comparison remarkably free from anti-Semitism since the World War. Apart from the journals of the late M. Coty, there has been little exploitation of anti-Semitism for political purposes. The Dreyfus Affair, involved as it was in the war between the clericals and anti-clericals, never really represented such deep feeling as has been exemplified in Germany from 1870 onwards. France, of course, suffered little from unemployment, and the post-war economic crisis has, up to comparatively recent times, left her untouched. Now that the depression is beginning at last to affect the franc, and unemployment is increasing, we may predict with confidence that anti-Semitism will not be long in following these symptoms of economic distress. German refugees have been welcomed, but in time they will inevitably be accused of taking the bread from French workers' mouths. It requires no great prophetic instinct to forecast protests to the Government and demands for increasing the immigration restrictions.

DO WE HATE THE JEWS?

The position in the Dominions may be said to resemble that in England. In Canada, anti-Semitism expresses itself mainly in social discrimination and the sporadic posting on walls of anti-Jewish posters. There are no legal disabilities, though immigration restrictions, aimed mainly against Jews, are in force.

The Union of South Africa has about 76,000 Jews, forming about 4 per cent of the white population. Mining development on the Rand and Kimberley was responsible for an influx of Jews in the '80's and '90's of the last century. The earlier immigrants, mainly from England, Holland, and Germany, arrived in small numbers early in the nineteenth century, and were for the most part absorbed into the general population. They were welcomed by the Dutch settlers as the "People of the Book," and no demonstrable anti-Jewish prejudice existed until modern times. Very strict immigration laws have recently been promulgated which in practice limit the entry of Jews into the Union to fifty in one year. Ostensibly the restrictions are aimed against immigrants from South-Eastern Europe, but, since this has hitherto been the principal source of new Jewish arrivals, their numbers have been effectively limited. Anti-Jewish feeling has now made its appearance in the universities. It is a strange circumstance in modern times that anti-Jewish feeling shows itself first in the universities. At all events, South African universities are just beginning to indulge in the formation of "Christian-national" groups, opposed to co-operation with Jewish students in inter-university affairs. The reason most quoted is that Jewish students are suspected of popularising radical and negrophile doctrines. Negrophilism is a heresy little tolerated by the healthy Afrikaner, and there is no more effective method of impugning the intellectual level and moral standards of a political opponent in South Africa than to label him a negrophilist. The inevitable shirted gentry (in this case the "Greyshirts"), too, have made their début. Their gospel of Jew-hatred falls on fruitful ground in a country which has been the scene of racial conflict almost since the beginning of its history.

DO WE HATE THE JEWS?

DO WE HATE THE JEWS?

Russia, since the Revolution, is almost entirely free from anti-Semitism. The Jewish religion is discouraged officially and the Zionist movement has been outlawed, but the Jews, as a racial minority, suffer little, if any, discrimination by contrast with the non-Jewish population. They have had territory offered them for the establishment of autonomous Jewish republics, and they have been encouraged to gravitate into agriculture and industry on equal terms with other Russians.

Nowhere, then, except possibly in Soviet Russia, is the Jew persona grata. The intensity of feeling fluctuates, but there exists, and has existed for centuries, a deep-rooted prejudice against him which no honest observer can deny. The poorest contribution one can make towards the solution of a problem is to pretend that it does not exist. And if most writers on this subject have not gone as far as this, at least they have nearly always succeeded in conveying the impression that Jew-baiting is a relic of the past and occurs to-day only in those countries where a medieval outlook persists. This view is wrong. Like many other outworn credos, anti-Semitism may be dusted, cleaned, dressed up in new clothes, and foisted on an unsuspecting world as the latest thing in world philosophies. The important point to bear in mind is that, from the Jew's point of view, the theory of anti-Semitism in the twentieth century may be as unpleasant in its results as that of the fifteenth.

DO WE HATE THE JEWS?

It is an interesting puzzle, this age-long feud. So much has been written in an effort to explain it that it seems almost presumptuous to venture on another attempt. But I believe that it can and must be done.

One thing I can promise the reader. This book is not written in the "Wailing Wall" tradition. It is not one long-sustained blast on the sufferings of Jews and the iniquities of Gentiles. My analysis may be founded on wrong premises, and my conclusions may be unsound, but at least I have not assumed that all Jews are either scoundrels or injured martyrs and all Gentiles sadists.

THE CASE FOR ANTI-SEMITISM

NO BOOK ON THE JEWS has ever been written which does not go through the same dreary formula of recounting the charges made against them and refuting them one by one. Philo in his Legatio ad Gaium, and Josephus in Contra Apionem, led the way. Their apologetics differ in no way from those of Le Roi Beaulieu, Lazare, or from the latest opus by Mr. Sidney Dark. Each examines the points of grievance against the Jew and then proceeds to show either that there is no foundation in fact for them, or that, if they exist, the fault lies with Gentiles in shaping the Jew into a mould which makes him depart from accepted standards.

I do not believe that a single anti-Semite has ever been converted by the arguments of philo-Semites. You may print thousands of pamphlets pointing out that Jews cannot be Communists and wicked "finance capitalists" at one and the same time, that they cannot be "internationalists" and ardent nationalists in one breath, that, if they do dominate the world, they get precious little fun out of it, and that most of them lead quite blameless lives, free from thoughts of guile and of cheating the simple-minded Gentile ; you may obtain testimonials for them from thousands of great and influential people ; nothing will avail you. It is infinitely easier by propaganda to persuade the human animal to hate than to love, and much easier to accuse than to defend.

THE CASE FOR ANTI-SEMITISM

The confirmed anti-Semite does not base his views on reason, but on prejudice. And, though there is usually a reason for prejudice, there is seldom reason in prejudice. What, then, is the use of describing the greatness of the Jews' history, their ancient lineage, and the story of their national heroes to a man who is convinced that the majority of them are scoundrels ? A fixed dislike of the Jew, like any other idée fixe, is quite beyond the reach of reasoned argument. This is true even for people who are otherwise enlightened. Voltaire, cheated by a Prussian Jew whom he himself had attempted to cheat, straightway developed a whole theory of anti-Semitism. And what applies to a mind like that of Voltaire has greater effect in lesser minds. Quite frequently a rabid anti-Semite, previously impervious to rational argument, will completely change his views for as illogical a reason as the one which made him hate Jews. One of the hated may show him a kindness, and immediately his whole outlook changes.

THE CASE FOR ANTI-SEMITISM

This should not be taken to mean that anti-Semitism is explained as an expression of the illogical human mind. When a man is duped by a Scotchman, he does not as a rule develop a deep complex against Scotchmen, nor, when a Scotchman confers a favour on him, does he translate this into terms of affection for the whole race. The analysis must go deeper.

Many attempts have been made to find a broad dividing-line between the Jew and his neighbour. Friends and enemies alike have tried to show that some basic incompatibility between the two peoples makes it impossible for them to live together in amity. Where these observers have differed has been in their analysis of what constitutes the dividing barrier.

Maurice Samuel and Ludwig Lewisohn, two modern Jewish writers, hold that there exists in the Jewish temperament a fundamental difference in outlook and mental horizon which makes it the antithesis of the dominant world outlook. Their contention, in short, is that Jewish values differ wholly from those of the Gentile, and that this clash of ultimate aspirations makes for hostility between them. For example, Samuel argues that the Jews look upon war with a horror that is not shared generally by Gentiles. To the latter the pagan love of games and sport finds expression in modern times in the excitement of war. The Jew's love of books and his studiousness are regarded as a racial peculiarity embodying a yearning for the spiritual which that healthy animal the Gentile disdains. Even the Jewish God is an intellectual abstraction, remote from the human, almost fallible, God of the Gentile.

THE CASE FOR ANTI-SEMITISM

Dr. Cecil Roth, the eminent Jewish historian, stressing this aspect, is reported as saying : "The Jews stood out as the protestants who had saved the world from the curse of uniformity . . . they still had their function to stand up as the champions of the free exercise of the human intellect. It might be that it was due to the passion for righteousness which they were told the Jew had. But he thought it was due more to the fact that the Jew, though he was willing to obey authority, was not constantly able to give implicit trust to authority. He questioned the basis of it even if he obeyed it. . . . The survival of Judaism might conceivably mean even now the survival of European culture, and the survival of the civilisation of the world as they know it" (Jewish Chronicle, March 23rd, 1934, p. 19).

This point of view is held fairly widely. A similar, if not quite so superficial, train of thought runs through the works of Achad Ha'am, and has been enunciated at varying intervals by many Jewish writers from Philo down to Josef Kastein in his recent History and Destiny of the Jews. Renan appears to have come to the same conclusion.

THE CASE FOR ANTI-SEMITISM

Mr. Belloc is convinced that only by segregating the two dissimilar elements can peace come to Israel. Even Karl Marx believed that the people from whom he had sprung were an alien group in society. "We therefore perceive in Judaism," he wrote, "a general pervading anti-social element, which has been carried to its highest point by the historical development, in which Jews in this bad relation have zealously co-operated—a point at which it must necessarily dissolve itself. The emancipation of the Jews, in its last significance, is the emancipation of mankind from Judaism" (Selected Essays : "The Jewish Question").

Hitler, on the other hand, borrowing his ideas from earlier German authors, interprets the dividing-line differently. Jewish values, according to him, deviate from those of the Gentile in that the Jew is incapable of comprehending the sacred ties of blood and race. The Jew is essentially international, and can have no real appreciation of the ideals which animate the "Aryan." The historic significance of racial destiny, of exalted patriotism, are emotions which no Jew can genuinely feel. It is this which makes him totally alien in mind from other peoples and renders him the enemy of their institutions. His destructive influence in national life is due to a cynical cosmopolitanism and a lack of sympathy with the aim of groups which regard race as the most important element in life. Hitler goes further. He decorates his theory with an enumeration of the evil characteristics of the Jew, in which every conceivable vice, every crime which the human mind is capable of planning, is laid at his door. With this latter portion of his argument I am not concerned. It forms his own contribution to the subject. I am interested only in the specific accusation that the Jew is inherently incapable of understanding "Aryan" views on race.

THE CASE FOR ANTI-SEMITISM

Mr. Dark, in the book from which I have already quoted, gives a different version of the cleavage between Jewish and Gentile worlds. In his opinion all conflicts, past and present, between opposing groups have been a struggle between the flamboyant and the drab. The theory is beautifully simple. What were the factors involved in the French Revolution? It was a revolution of the drab against the decadent flamboyant! The revolution of 1848? Simplicity itself. A revolt of the drab! The overthrow of the Paris Commune? Merely the final conquest of power by the drab. What, then, is the essential feature of the Austrian

THE CASE FOR ANTI-SEMITISM

Civil War of 1934? Is it necessary to ask? A revolt of the flamboyant against the drab. "Every political movement for the last hundred and fifty years has either been a revolt of the flamboyant against the drab, or of the drab against the flamboyant." After this it becomes profoundly easy to account for anti-Semitism. The Jew is a "bourgeois par excellence." The bourgeois is drab. Therefore anti-Semitism is a fight of flamboyant against drab. It sounds almost incredible, but if any reader imagines that I am doing Mr. Dark an injustice he had better read his book. He will discover that its author has produced a social theory which does away with the necessity for studying history. He will be presented with a rule of thumb which will help him to explain not only the social struggles of the past, but of the future. And this is the book which receives high words of praise from Dr. Weizmann and Mr. Neville Laski! It is a pathetic illumination of the precarious position in which the Jew finds himself to-day that he has to be grateful for a book on his people merely because it contains no abuse of them. We need not be surprised that Mr. Dark, after such a display of intellectual bankruptcy, is left at the end with no concrete ideas and no constructive advice on the real Jewish problem. His book tails off to the helpless and hopeless conclusion that anti-Semitism, like the poor, must continue to be a feature of life until the struggle between flamboyant and drab ends in the final victory of the drab.

THE CASE FOR ANTI-SEMITISM

The observant reader will have noticed that there is no basic difference between what we may call the Hitler view of a fundamental cleavage and the theory of a different world-outlook adumbrated by Samuel, Kastein, Lewisohn, and their illustrious predecessors. On their reasoning, a Jewish baby comes into the world with either an innately developed "international" instinct or a set of values differing from those of the Gentile baby born down the road. Or, if this is an exaggeration, perhaps it would be fairer to say that on their assumption the peculiar position of Jews throughout their history has tended to develop in them an attitude towards life which separates them from the rest of the world. The point at issue between these writers consists in their estimate of the practical outcome of such isolation. The Hitlerite conception is that it results in a constant clash of ideals which would end in the destruction and disintegration of "Aryan" civilisation if the Jewish view triumphed. The opposite school holds that his aloofness creates in the Jew an objective outlook which, translated into art, science, literature, and politics, should serve as a wholesome corrective to the more hurried life of the majority. According to this view, the essential feature of Jewish thought is that it sets up a standard of moral values which the rest of the world cannot afford to lose.

THE CASE FOR ANTI-SEMITISM

In one respect, then, both agree : the Jew, because of his material isolation, is spiritually isolated from the rest of humanity. In the last analysis the case for anti-Semitism will be seen to rest on this differentiation of the Jew. The fact that it is regarded as a vice by some and a virtue by others is immaterial. From this central feature emerge all the accusations and counter-accusations which characterise this controversy. The Jewish professional code of honour differs from that of his Gentile colleague. His commercial standards deviate from accepted usage. Jewish political theory breeds subversive views. Jewish art is alien : even Jewish music offends "Aryan" ears. The tacit assumption of a fundamental difference of outlook is as implicit in the wildest charges against him as it is in the pseudo-liberal interpretations of anti-Jewish feeling. An example of the latter may be seen in a recent article by Mr. St. John Ervine. Commenting on the retirement of a prominent Jewish Soviet official, he remarks that it is interesting to observe that Stalin is quietly and unostentatiously pursuing the same policy as Hitler in ridding himself of Jewish influence. The implication is that such influence in both instances is recognised as being antagonistic to the national life of Germans and Russians.

THE CASE FOR ANTI-SEMITISM

In one form or another all generalisations on the Jew have their origin in this belief of a fundamental cleavage. And since it is as easy to bring statistics to prove that Jews have made valuable contributions to civilisation as it is to prove that some of the most unpleasant desperadoes in history have been Jews, the interpretation of this cleavage results in the most diverse opinions as to its effect. It is futile, then, to attempt to answer all the complaints, frivolous or otherwise, that have been made against Jews. No sooner is it established, for instance, that there never has been a Jewish plot to dominate the world, and that the "protocols of Zion" is an impudent forgery, than somebody discovers that the Communist movement is Jewish. It is impossible to keep pace with the constantly changing aspect of the case against the Jew.

Nor is it necessary to enter into all the devious by-paths into which an examination of the argument against the Jew would lead us. If all its manifestations are due to prejudice, such prejudice is based in the last analysis on this conception of a material and spiritual gulf separating Jewry from Christendom.

THE CASE FOR ANTI-SEMITISM

Now it is essential to realise that whether such a gulf really exists is immaterial. What does matter is whether the belief that it exists is universally held. And on that point, I think, there can be no doubt. I have shown that not only Gentiles, but Jews as well, subscribe to this view. And behind all the minor stupidities which encumber the problem looms this idea of two groups with diverging ideals and different values—a conception which, as I have indicated, goes back to the remotest antiquity.

But since ideas do not take shape in men's minds out of the realm of pure metaphysics, but have a definite relationship to reality (which is merely the philosophic way of saying that there is no smoke without fire), it becomes necessary to enquire into the history of the social relationship between Jews and Gentiles for an explanation of the prevalence of this belief.

It is only from an objective study of the development of the Jew in his material relationship with other people that a rational conception of anti-Semitism can emerge, and it is only with such a conception as a background that we may hope to offer any constructive suggestions for the resolution of the antagonism between them. In succeeding chapters I hope to make this clear, but one aspect of the matter must take precedence. Recognising the importance of this cleavage, many Jews and Gentiles have advocated wholesale assimilation for ending the hostility which is said to flow from it. I propose in the next chapter to discuss the theory of assimilation more fully.

THE CASE FOR ANTI-SEMITISM

THE FAILURE OF ASSIMILATION

IN HIS LATEST DREAM of a world to come, Mr. H. G. Wells has something to say of the position of the Jews in that world. "There had been a widespread belief in the tenacity and solidarity of Judaism. The Jews had been able to keep themselves a people apart, eating peculiar food and following distinctive religious practices, a nation within a nation, in every State in the world. They had been a perpetual irritant to statesmen, a breach in the collective solidarity everywhere. They had played a peculiar in-and-out game of social relationship. One could never tell whether a Jew was being a citizen or whether he was just being a Jew. They married, they traded preferentially. They had their own standards of behaviour. Wherever they abounded their peculiarities aroused bitter resentment.

"It might have been supposed that a people so widely dispersed would have developed a cosmopolitan mentality and formed a convenient linking organisation for many world purposes, but their special culture of isolation was so intense that this they neither did nor seemed anxious to attempt. After the World War, the orthodox Jews played but a poor part in the early attempts to formulate the Modern State, being far more preoccupied with a dream called Zionism, the dream of a fantastic independent State all of their own in Palestine, which, according to their Babylonian legend, was the original home of all this synthesis of Semitic-speaking peoples. Only a psychoanalyst could begin to tell them for what they wanted this Zionist State. It emphasised their traditional wilful separation from the main body of mankind. It irritated the world against them, subtly and incurably. . . . And yet, between 1940 and 2050, in a little more than a century, this antiquated, obdurate culture disappeared. It and its Zionist State, its kosher food, the Law, and all the rest of its paraphernalia were completely merged in the human community. The Jews were not suppressed : there was no extermination : yet they were educated out of their oddity and racial egotism in little more than three generations. Their attention was distracted from Moses and the promise to Abraham and the delusion that God made His creation for them alone, and they were taught the truth about their race. The world is as full as ever it was of men and women of Semitic origin, but they belong no more to Israel" (Shape of Things to Come).

THE FAILURE OF ASSIMILATION

THE FAILURE OF ASSIMILATION

Mr. Wells was at one time President of the World Alliance for Combating Anti-Semitism, but it would seem that the membership of this organisation does not necessarily connote an intelligent appreciation of the Jewish problem. Mr. Wells, in 1934, says what Hecataeus, Appolonius, Molo, Apion and Philostratus, Juvenal and Tacitus, said over two thousand years ago. Philostratus wrote that "people who do not share with others their table, their libations, their prayers, their sacrifices, are further removed from us than Susa or Bactria or even furthest India." In voicing his irritation against the clannishness of Jews, Mr. Wells is a lineal descendant of Haman, who charged them with being a people governed by laws "diverse from all people : neither keep they the King's laws : therefore it is not for the King's profit to suffer them."

Mr. Wells may appropriately be described as a classic example of a man in a hurry. It is his impatience with reality that makes him the super-idealist of his age. An incorrigible Utopian, his remedy for this problem, as for all other problems which have engaged his attention, is Utopian. Let us translate Mr. Wells's "educating the Jews out of their oddity and racial egotism" into practical terms. If, having seen the light, the whole corporate body of Jews decided that in complete assimilation only lay their salvation, and resolved to put their theory into practice, there would follow a determined onslaught on Gentile men and women for marriage partners, which, in its relentless desire for annihilation, could compare only with the desperate urge of a salmon pushing its way upstream to death. It presupposes a degree of co-operation on the part of the partners in the assimilatory process which has hitherto been conspicuously lacking. It demands from the Jews a revolution in ideas before a revolution in the conditions of life has been created whereby such ideas can find application. It is a solution which ignores only one consideration—that of practicability. In forgetting the fetters which bind practice to theory, and in his consequent flight from reality, Mr. Wells is, however, running true to form. His revolutions have always taken place in drawing-rooms and scientific laboratories remote from contact with the actual world.

THE FAILURE OF ASSIMILATION

Superficially, of course, this nonconformity of the Jews makes the problem peculiarly susceptible to facile generalisation. Mr. Wells is at one with many liberal-minded observers, who, seeing in the exclusiveness of the Jews a weapon for their enemies, dispose of the whole question by arbitrarily demanding their complete absorption in the dominant race. They are strengthened in their belief of Jewish separatism by a considerable section of Jewish opinion. Thus Dr. Weizmann writes : " Jews always seek explanations for anti-Semitism, economic, political, racial, religious, etc. I say that these things are only incidental. We need not look for explanations. How is it that over two thousand years, in all ages, there has always been the same phenomenon ? The explanation is that we Jews do not want to die. In spite of the persecution of thousands of years, we are still here in a special way, a minority in a majority. We remain Jews, keep our traditions, do not do as the Romans do. We are Jews and remain Jews, and that is what the world does not understand. . . . This explains the difference between Polish and German Jewry. The Polish Jew knows why he suffers ; he is a Jew ; but the German Jews do not even know for what they are suffering ; many of them are no longer conscious of being Jews."

THE FAILURE OF ASSIMILATION

Apparently, then, the trouble is that the Jew wants to remain different. But, as Dr. Weizmann himself says, the German Jew did not want to remain different as soon as conditions allowed him not to be different. There is no terrific urge for survival in the Jew. Grant him civic freedom and a measure of liberty and you get a state of affairs where the German Jew cannot realise why he is being persecuted. The trouble is not that the Jew wants to remain different. It is that he is forced to remain different, and the Polish Jew controversy, which has been used by both Zionists and anti-Semites, displays clearly the cause of this inverted reasoning.

THE FAILURE OF ASSIMILATION

The Polish Jew, a product of the ghetto, had to remain differentiated because the barbaric conditions under which he lived allowed him no alternative. He could not assimilate the habits and customs of his Polish neighbours because he was not permitted anywhere except in the pale. He presented a complete contrast to the assimilated German Jew, and, when he went to Germany, he appeared inevitably as the poor relation, emphasising the humble origin of his more fortunate brother. As such he was despised by the man who had "got on in life." To-day, in nationalist Jewish circles, the Polish Jew is the white-headed boy. He is hailed as a realist ; the Jew who sticks to his guns and does not desert the fold. Not unnaturally, there is some malicious rejoicing in the fall of the wealthy relation. The German Jew is being blamed for being the product of his material surroundings, just as the Polish Jew receives the credit for reflecting, in his ideology, the manner in which he is forced to live.

This question of the desire of the Jew to remain a creature apart is of the utmost significance to us in our study, for it is one of the commonest fallacies which delude both Jew and Gentile. It is so patently a fraudulent claim that a moment's consideration puts it out of court. What, in fact, is the life history of the modern Jew? His parents or grandparents, settling in a civilised country, have all the distinguishing features of the orthodox Jew. One by one the children shed their Judaism. They become lax in their religious observances; they give up their dietary laws; their manners, customs, and habits of thought approximate more closely to those of their Gentile neighbours. Inter-marriage—the last stumbling-block to complete assimilation—is not long in following. Ruppin, in his analysis of assimilation, proves conclusively that in the free atmosphere of emancipation all the signs of absorption increase: decline of religion, loosening of family ties, decline of specific language, discarding of Jewish names, spread of secular education, mixed marriage, and baptism.

THE FAILURE OF ASSIMILATION

Now, one might say that this process, which, if it means anything at all, certainly does not indicate a strong “will for differentiation,” is one that applies only to an inferior type of Jew—the backslider—and that it is not typical of the upright and uncompromising Jew who wants to retain his identity. Nobody who is familiar with the way in which Jewry—English, French, and American—was developing prior to the recent débâcle will support this. Naturally the process is not a uniform one. In some cases the religious tie is hard to break. In others the concentration of Jews in a given area may be so great, comparatively, that public opinion prevents “backsliding.”

THE FAILURE OF ASSIMILATION

Einstein writes : “ The assimilation of the Jews to the European nations among whom they lived, in language, in customs, and, to some extent, even in the form of religious organisation, could not eradicate the feeling of a lack of kinship between them and those among whom they lived. . . . This lack of kinship is referable to the law of the conservation of energy. Nationalities do not want to be fused. . . .” (About Zionism). Just previous to this, however, he has written : “ Until two years ago I lived in Switzerland, and during my stay there I did not realise my Judaism. There was nothing that called forth any Jewish sentiments in me. When I moved to Berlin, all that changed. There I realised the difficulties with which so many Jews are confronted.”

Now this does not prove that Einstein is wrong and the assimilationists right. It merely proves that the social sciences call for exact thinking and reasoned intelligence as much as do physics and mathematics. And perhaps, also, it adds point to the remarks I have made elsewhere on the subject of professors. The "will for differentiation" is accentuated only by persecution and social and legal discrimination. This is why the German situation and the rise of anti-Semitic movements in other parts has stiffened the resistance to absorption and created in Jews the world over a feeling of comradeship in misfortune, a desire to remain apart, and a horror of assimilation.

THE FAILURE OF ASSIMILATION

Exaggeration of national consciousness is a reflection of material considerations. It does not arise as a fixed idea or plan in the realm of pure thought. And if it is a reflection of material considerations, it cannot change until these material considerations change. "Educating the Jews out of it" is impractical unless, prior to that, conditions are created which are favourable to the changed outlook.

Assimilation as the cure is no new suggestion. True, it was more fashionable thirty years ago. But the cosmopolitan mind still hankers after this panacea of wholesale hara-kari. Mr. Shaw on more than one occasion has offered the kindly advice to the Jews of intermarriage as the readiest solution of their difficulties. I wonder what he would think of the man who suggested as the solution of poverty the intermarriage of the poor and the rich?

THE FAILURE OF ASSIMILATION

The disappearance of a group of people as a distinct entity, their merging into homogeneity with the other groups, demands certain essential prerequisites. First, there must be a similarity of customs, of tradition, of language, and, as a rule, of religion. Second, there must be intermarriage and, above all, the weaker group must not be too numerous and must be isolated from affiliation with their racial origins. If a constant infiltration of new, unassimilated individuals occurs, the absorptive process is bound to be hindered.

Assimilation, then, is divided into two parts. We may talk of an assimilation of culture, by which is meant the process whereby the stranger adopts the language, the customs, the occupations, and the loyalties of his host. This kind of assimilation, however, is not enough. There must be wholesale intermarriage ; and of these two factors the latter is the greater. In actual fact, assimilation of culture and assimilation by intermarriage has existed amongst Jews since they first appeared in history. It exists now, and will inevitably continue to do so. Why, then, have the Jews persisted as a separate group, a nation within a nation ? Their story is not an unrelieved one of suffering and persecution, even if their histories read as if it were. They were settled in Spain for nearly a thousand years. During the greater part of that time they were tolerated and even welcomed. They lived under conditions which might be described as favourable to the assimilatory process. When they were expelled from England, they had lived there for three hundred years. Jews dwelt in Germany before the native inhabitants became Christians. The Germany of Mendelssohn's days and after was a period when absorption of the Jew into the dominant nation might reasonably have been anticipated. Post-revolutionary France, when liberty, equality, and fraternity were cries that resounded throughout Europe, was surely a promise of a new era for him. His incorporation into the commercial, professional, and industrial life of his neighbours, which was a feature of the modern period from about 1860 to the outbreak of the Great War, might have been assumed to have led to his eventual disappearance. Throughout these periods the Jews had ample time in which to assimilate the national cultures of the people among whom they dwelt, and to intermarry. How, then, have they survived to plague Mr. Wells with their separate existence? The problem is intimately bound up with various factors which I shall have occasion to refer to subsequently. Here it is sufficient to say that the process of assimilation is at best a slow one, and usually most evident when least obvious. The adoption of new languages, new customs, new traditions, new loyalties, and, above all, new religions, when the group involved is numerically large, must take many years to complete itself. In countries like Sweden, Denmark, and Norway, where the number of Jews has always been insignificant, this process of blending and ultimate disappearance is now almost complete. In modern Italy there is hardly a single Jewish family that is not related by intermarriage to Gentile Italians (Fishberg). The early Jewish settlers in South Africa were well on the way to obliteration as a separate body until the mass immigration which followed the discovery of gold and diamonds brought many thousands of Jews into the country.

THE FAILURE OF ASSIMILATION

THE FAILURE OF ASSIMILATION

It is easy to see one reason for their separation, then, in the constant increase of their numbers by mass immigration from less kindly disposed countries, a factor which tends to negative the assimilation already proceeding and to cast the lurid light of publicity on a process which needs a kind of unawareness to make it successful. Thus, Mr. J. F. W. Thelwell, Commercial Counsellor to His Majesty's Embassy at Berlin, in a report issued by the Department of Overseas Trade, writes : " The Jews are regarded by the National Socialists as an alien race whose admixture with Aryan stock is undesirable, and whose political views are too international to be compatible with the national standpoint. The reason given by the National Socialist Party is that there has been a steady influx, during a long period, of Jews from the eastern portion of Europe, who have definitely formed an unassimilated foreign body in Germany." It has been pointed out by reliable observers that the Nazi description of Germany swarming with East-European Jews is greatly exaggerated. The point is unimportant. Statistically they were probably fewer than imagined, but there were obviously enough of them to obtrude themselves on "Aryan" consciousness. The native German could not be expected to philosophise on the reasons for the contrast between Polish Jew and German Jew. To him, both were Jews, and both stood or fell on the merits or demerits of the other. It was the "caftan" of the unassimilated Viennese Jew that terrified the German Führer in the days of his callow youth, and woke in him the fear of the "alien menace." So the policy of assimilation was a complete failure, despite the fact that Germany was the country par excellence where the Jew was being assimilated rapidly, even desperately, in an attempt, chameleon-like, to adapt himself to his environment.

THE FAILURE OF ASSIMILATION

It is obvious that wholesale assimilation is not feasible now, for the same reason that it never really was feasible, once the Jews were dispersed. If the 16 million Jews in the world to-day could be transported to one country where there were, say, 100 million of another nationality, and they were allowed to live together peacefully for several hundred years, it might be possible to predict their ultimate disappearance in the dominant race. But no such possibility exists. If determined efforts had been made to crush them out of existence simultaneously and synchronously, or if they had been treated with toleration and kindness over a sufficiently long period wherever they had settled, there would have been no Jews by now and no Jewish question. But no such world Utopia ever appeared. The Jewish battle is fought on too large a front.

THE FAILURE OF ASSIMILATION

Fundamentally the cry for uniformity is a dishonest one, because it is not founded on reality. Strangely enough, it emanates from the very people who base their objections to the Socialist State on the deadening uniformity which they imagine it would entail. They object to nationalism and Zionism—which is the Jewish echo of nationalism—on the ground that it emphasises the differences that keep people apart, and they object to the classless society, because, in their opinion, it would reduce the individual to a cypher.

THE FAILURE OF ASSIMILATION

The resistance to absorption comes from both sides. We see this in the laws of the Jews forbidding intermarriage, and in the long list of decrees issued by the Church at various intervals on similar lines. If such resistance depends on mutual antagonism, as it undoubtedly must, surely the logical method of dealing with the problem consists in reconciling these differences rather than in reiterating the demand for absorption. No sane person would really like to see a standardised world, with everyone reduced to a dead level of sameness. At the present stage of civilisation the task which faces us is how to retain the characteristics of a "diversity of creatures" without creating thereby a situation in which diversity is translated into intolerance and enmity.

It is because this essential prerequisite has never been dealt with practically that assimilation, such as it was, has been a hopeless failure. The German Jews, who imagined that it was necessary only to marry Germans, and to outvie them in their devotion to things German, have had a rude awakening. The Spanish Jews, who believed that their difficulties would be solved by becoming Christians, were equally disillusioned. Is there any clearer proof that the foundations of anti-Semitism do not rest on the exclusiveness of the Jews nor on the denial of the Christian God?

THE FAILURE OF ASSIMILATION

The race which the Jew has run in his search for oblivion appears to be never-ending. There is always a new hurdle to negotiate. His religion was different. He attempted to discard it. His patriotism was suspect. Very well, he became ultra-patriotic and waved the flags of his hosts. And now he is told that his blood is incompatible. He is told that Semitic blood and "Aryan" blood cannot mix. Here is a poser indeed. For, short of a gigantic experiment in blood-transfusion (always providing that "Aryan" donors prove amenable), there seems no way in which he can take this hurdle. The development of the latest obstacle which the Jew is being asked to surmount, however, is one that demands fuller discussion.

ARYANS, NORDICS, HUNDRED PERCENTERS, AND SUCH-LIKE

WHEN LINCOLN SPOKE about fooling all the people all of the time, he was not allowing for the popular Press and the power of the printed word. To many people the printed word has the sanction which priestly incantations possessed in the dark ages. Nowhere is this more clearly illustrated than in the pseudo-scientific fantasies of writers on racial hygiene—a cult which has assumed significant proportions in temporarily crazy Germany. Their pedantic generalisations have bemused not only a group of people who should have known better, but have lent spurious authority to legislation by politicians who could not have been expected to know any better. These witch-doctors of science find in the magic of print the sanctions which their tribal predecessors derived from the inability of their followers to penetrate their pretensions and impostures.

To-day “Aryans” are definitely in the news. But in Germany “Aryan” has become Aryan. Solemn Nazi proclamations glorify the Teutonic Aryan, and Lord Rothermere flirts with an "Aryan" people whom his papers were labelling "Huns" not so many years ago.

ARYANS, NORDICS, AND SUCH-LIKE

Professor Max Müller, a distinguished philologist, discovered, late in the nineteenth century, a similarity between the Sanskrit, Persian, Greek, Latin, Slavonic, and Teutonic languages. He presupposed a common origin for these languages in an "Aryan" language spoken by an Indo-Germanic or Indo-European race, an "Aryan" race. He himself placed the area in which dwelt this hypothetical group speaking the "Aryan" tongue in the Asiatic region north of the Black Sea, but he emphasised the difficulty of fixing their abode. It is imperative to notice that we have no evidence that an "Aryan" race ever existed. If it did, we do not know where it dwelt. The cradle-land has been stated variously to be the plains of Hungary, Southern or Central Russia, Hindu Kush, or the Southern Baltic. French anthropologists claim them for French soil, Germans for German. They have been described now as long heads, now as round heads. They have been presumed by different writers to be blond, brunette, tall, or medium. The one thing we do know is that there is a similarity between Sanskrit and European languages, and that possibly a race existed speaking a language which later in geographical indemnity to Germany, leading inevitably to financial over-speculation, resulted in a post-war crash, the unpopularity of the Jew was intensified. The association of prominent Jews in financial scandals helped the growth of official anti-Semitic parties which were now founded. Indeed, it is in this period that the word anti-Semitism was coined. Inarticulate resentment of the poorer classes, and the growing contradictions of the new economic order, became, in the hands of opportunist politicians, a refined instrument for the achievement of power. They seized eagerly upon the ethical justifications which anthropologists had providentially established for them to wage a crude campaign against the newly emancipated Jew. With the passing of the depression the political movement lost its momentum, to be revived in its most extreme form as a result of this poverty and distress following on the Great War. The Hitlerites have found no dearth of racial theorists to support the crudities of their régime.

Is there anything in the doctrine of racial superiority? Let me state, as clearly as I can, what research and study have established. Whilst we have definite and clear proof that physical characteristics are heritable, there is no proof at all that mental qualities are hereditarily transmitted. A group of people preponderantly blue-eyed, straight-haired, and round-headed, will most likely produce children who are preponderantly blue-eyed, straight-haired, and round-headed. A white man married to a white woman will produce white children, but nobody can predict whether these children will be Einsteins, Napoleons, or just ordinary morons. Except in certain types of feeble-mindedness, and not even definitely here, we cannot say with certainty anything as to what their mental qualities will be. What we do know is that their physical and social environment does seem to influence their mental development. We can say definitely that if children are adequately fed, have decent medical attention, go to good schools, have intelligent teachers, and if the cultural environment of their homes is good, they will show a much larger proportion of civilised adults than a similar group growing up in less favourable surroundings. This is as much as we can say with confidence.

PERCENTERS, AND SUCH-LIKE

It is possible to breed a race of blue-eyed, tall blonds, though the enormous amount of race mixture which has taken place makes this unlikely, but it is quite impossible to predict that they will all prove fit to carry on the traditions of European civilisation in art, science, and literature.

Let me be as explicit and as definite as I can be on this subject. These things are mysteries to most people who, confused between genes and chromosomes, end finally by weakly accepting the conclusions offered by anthropologists and geneticists. And this is just where the harm done by gangster biologists is infinitely greater than by ordinary crooks. For at least your Chicago gunman can shoot up only the citizens of Chicago, but the academic gunman lends sanction to Government policies and shapes the destinies of nations. You may divide up the people who live on this planet into certain arbitrary groups—into groups with straight or curly hair, with round or long heads, with narrow or broad noses, or with black, yellow, or white skins. You will find that your groups merge into one another, and that it would be difficult to separate them at their periphery, but in the main you will be able to establish arbitrary lines of division. These physical traits—of texture of hair, colour of skin, and shape of head¹—are heritable traits ; that is, they are transmissible on Mendelian principles.

If you fancied blonds, and desired your race to be exclusively blue-eyed and fair-haired, and if you saw to it that your experimental station was run on the same lines as racing stables, and if you ignored the prejudice against incest and inbreeding, you might in the course of time achieve your blond race. But—and this is the crux—even if you started your blond race with cultured and clever individuals, unless you saw to it that they were properly fed and educated, you would have no guarantee at all as to the mental qualities or level of culture of your problematical blond race. Now, of course, race theorists may think of a race of blonds as a truly “chosen” race, God, in fact, preferring blonds, though many would no doubt recoil from the æsthetic aridity of a world peopled exclusively by blue-eyed, flax-haired Nordics. But what becomes of your race of supermen destined to lead civilisation on to greater heights? Your blonds might turn out mental defectives if you insisted strongly enough on racial purity. For good or ill we are all mongrels, and possibly the richness and diversity of human institutions are attributable to this.

¹ Genetic character of head form is not clearly proved. It is now known to be affected by environment.

PERCENTERS, AND SUCH-LIKE

We arrive, then, at this situation: if we desire an intelligent race, a race of healthy people, with cultivated, eager minds, we must cease to rant of racial purity and concentrate on the material considerations in which these objects may be achieved. We must see to it that children get good food, that their teachers have open, honest, and trained minds, and that their home surroundings are such as to favour mental and cultural development. And when we can provide this we may be absolutely certain that the results will be as effective in individuals with straight hair or curly hair, blue eyes or brown, hooked noses or straight, flat-footed or not, whether their ancestors spoke Greek, Hebrew, or Choctaw. "The culture of any given people is primarily dependent upon their mode of living, which is in itself largely an expression of geographical conditions," writes Professor A. C. Haddon. And Thomas Hunt Morgan, the Nobel Prize geneticist, the greatest living authority on genetics, says: "Least of all should we feel any assurance in deciding genetic superiority or inferiority as applied to whole races, by which is meant, not races in a biological sense, but social or political groups moulded together by physical conditions, by religious sentiments, or by political organisation. . . . If it is unjust to condemn a whole people, how much more hazardous it is, as some sensational writers have not hesitated to, to pass judgment as to the relative superiority or inferiority of different races. If within each human social group the geneticist finds it impossible to discover with any reasonable certainty the genetic basis of behaviour, the problems must seem extraordinarily difficult when groups are contrasted with each other, where the differences are obviously connected not only with material advantages and disadvantages resulting from conditions, climate, soil, and mineral wealth, but with traditions, customs, religion, taboos, conventions, and prejudices. A little goodwill might seem more fitting in treating these complicated questions than the attitude adopted by some of the modern race propagandists."

PERCENTERS, AND SUCH-LIKE

Here we may digress for a moment to enquire why there are scientists who deceive us, what possible motive they can have, and why their distorted science is so popular. In the first place we must bear in mind that a mistaken theory in race culture or anthropology is not so easily disproved as one in other branches of science. A quack physicist, chemist, or bacteriologist may be shown up when his experimental data are proved to be false by other workers. It is not so easy when a man draws his conclusions from the scanty details available in this field of research. An honest scientific worker states his facts, tries to establish a general law, and, when he has sufficient proof of experimental verification, feels justified in communicating the results to his co-workers. Your notoriety seeker in science gathers a few facts, flings together a theory, and dashes into print before you can stop him.

In the second place, few people are aware of the awe-inspiring fact that a man may be an international authority on the history of ancient civilisation and yet be abysmally ignorant as to what properly constitutes modern civilisation. In other words, a man may be a professor and a superlative donkey at the same time. He may be worse. He may allow his predilections and superstitions to intrude on the results of his scientific observations.

Certain schools are more susceptible to this weakness than others. Long ago, Porson, the Greek scholar, said that German philosophers dive deeper and come up muddier than anyone else ; and, if this does not hold generally, it applies with great force to the race of philosophers who have debased, and are debasing, the sacred traditions of science. " The chief difference between these heredity-mongers and the Ku Klux Klan is the difference between kid gloves and a nightgown—they have the same ethics " (Dorsey). When one thinks of the professors of " racial hygiene " who are being employed by the Hitler régime to corrupt the minds of unfortunate German children, it is enough to make one despair for the future of their country.

In a way, the respect which the average man has for the specialised worker is responsible for a great deal of harm. The reverence for the printed word is such that the harassed layman may well be forgiven for thinking that there must be something in it if Professor So-and-So and Professor Such-and-Such both say the same thing, especially if they say it often enough. And then it is much easier to be persuaded that all your troubles are due to an influx into your country of strange people than to believe that they may be due to exploitation by your own kith and kin. It is gratifying to be assured of your immense superiority over alien races, even if at times you are inclined to wonder wistfully why the alien seems to prosper and you do not.

PERCENTERS, AND SUCH-LIKE

And so you applaud when your worried politicians apply immigration restrictions and the world is made safe for you. And, when this does not serve to bring prosperity, you sit back and decide that perhaps you were mistaken. In the meantime, thousands of people have had their homes broken up, have been harried and bullied, and have had deeply etched in their consciousness (since most of them understand the process as little as you do) a sense of shame and inferiority, which becomes progressively harder to eradicate.

One further aspect must be examined. I have said that there is no pure race. The Jews do not constitute a pure race. It is unnecessary to go digging in old churchyards to discover whether Hitler and Goebbels have Jewish blood. It would be difficult for them to have avoided it. Karl Kautsky in his book, Are the Jews a Race? devotes much energy to proving that there is nothing which justifies the anti-Semite in declaring that the Jews are a race apart, an alien group dissimilar physically and mentally to their "Aryan" neighbours. Fishberg gives many anthropological data in support of the same thesis. The enraged Mr. Belloc points out that these observers would have us believe that no such person as a Jew exists, that he is a figment of the imagination, but that we have only to walk into the street to see a Jew and to recognise him as such.

Which brings me to make an important observation. There are many who look like Jews but who are not Jews, and on this point Mr. Belloc is wrong and Kautsky and Fishberg right. But the crucial fact is that if you are convinced a man is a Jew you will behave towards him as if he were a Jew. It makes no difference whether a given individual is a Jew or not. If you are under the impression that he is one, you will react to him as if he were a Jew. And so whether the Jews are a pure race or not is of little significance. What does matter is your attitude to the Jew. In other words, the Jews are a race because others consider them a race, and in this Mr. Belloc is right and Messrs. Kautsky and Fishberg wrong.

PERCENTERS, AND SUCH-LIKE

The answer, then, to the question "What is a Jew?" is: "A Jew is an individual who is regarded by others as a Jew." Now, at first sight this resembles Eve's reply to Adam, who asked her why she named a creature with a trunk and tusks an elephant: "Because it looks like an elephant." But it is the only definition which fits the facts. If you will examine all the other definitions of race you will find that in each category there would be people whom you would still call Jews and yet would not fit into your compartments. Religion? Language? Traditions? Customs? Physical appearance? Mental traits? Common loyalties? None of them embrace all Jews. Your dealer in mysticism and purveyor of magic would tell you that there is something indefinable at the root of Jewishness. But I have a dislike for things which are indefinable, and so I prefer to say that a Jew is a Jew as soon as he is taken by everybody else to be a Jew. And if you tell me that simply because his neighbours think that Jones is mad, that does not make Jones mad, I reply that from Jones's point of view it does not matter, because if everybody thinks he is mad he will be locked up and treated as if he were mad. And perhaps I ought to add that if all his neighbours think he is dangerously mad he may, in point of fact, become dangerously mad. Give a dog a bad name and he will answer to that name.

“ Race as a constituent element in nationality is a purely subjective emotion ; a view already hinted at by Seeley when, in his analysis of nationality, he gave as one of its united forces ‘ community of race, or rather the belief in the community of race.’ The effects of a belief are not dependent upon its validity ; and none can deny that this belief, like others equally false, has been productive, and is still productive to-day, of the most far-reaching results” (John Oakesmith, Race and Nationality, p. 50).

So whether the Jews are a race or not is merely of academic importance. The observable fact is that they are regarded by the groups amongst whom they dwell as a different group, with different traditions, different customs, and possibly a different outlook on life. They are regarded as an alien, inassimilable group, and, although they lack the political status which sets the seal on sovereign nations, they must nevertheless be regarded as a separate nation, with all the political and cultural problems inherent in a nationality. Their national problem is complicated further in that there is no area in the world in which they can give political expression to their national independence. We arrive, then, at the paradoxical situation that, contrary to historic precedent, the claims of the nationalist Jew have been willingly conceded, even forced on him by his neighbours. Those Jews who, in the late nineteenth and early twentieth century, hoped to get themselves accepted as nationals, but religious dissentients, in the country in which they dwelt, were doomed to disappointment in a world which was just discovering that its future political progress must be based on a conception of independent national States. Before we can assess the importance of this status to the Jew we shall have to discuss in some detail the historical significance of nationality and nationalism, and how it affects his destiny.

PERCENTERS, AND SUCH-LIKE

CONFLICTS OF NATIONALISM

THERE IS PROBABLY no more urgent problem facing civilisation to-day than the status of nationalism. From the academic excursions of historians it has emerged as a popular political battle-cry. It is not so long ago that the word "nationality" was associated in the minds of most people with the cool, impersonal demands for information embodied in passports. To-day the air resounds with the demands of clamant nationalities for a place in the sun.

It is a commonplace that no social phenomenon can be studied without regard to its economic background, and in this respect the problem of nationalism is no exception. Some writers have not hesitated to describe it as a vague, imponderable emotion, incapable of logical analysis. We cannot, however, begin to understand its manifestations and potentialities until we are ready to shake off all theological bias, and discuss it as an ideological reflection of the material basis of society. We shall discover that there is no call for metaphysical hair-splitting if we recognise that in nationalism we have a form of traditional loyalty to a system which has been necessary to our economic evolution.

CONFLICTS OF NATIONALISM

Up to the fifteenth century, nationalism was unknown. Before that the interests of workmen, tradesmen, peasants, and even of feudal nobility were centred in the cities. Men would fight, not for their country, but for their city-states, and, when kings waged war, they had to depend, not upon the spontaneous loyalty of their subjects, but upon mercenaries, and contributions of serfs from the feudal chiefs who nominally rendered homage to their sovereign. Thus what we would term civil wars to-day were frequent enough occurrences in feudal Europe. It is a tribute to the growth of nationalism that such civil wars are now regarded with as much horror in public life as incest in private life.

There were, of course, no interests which bound the people of one city-state to another—except the tie of the Church. And this tie was used whenever concerted action became necessary. Just as the slogan for war to-day is based on an appeal to a common nationalism, so in the medieval wars the slogan was based on an appeal to a common religion. And it was precisely because such appeal was tenuous that concerted action—as, for example, in the Crusades—generally ended unsuccessfully.

But with the growth of a merchant class, and their achievement of monopoly through the powerful craft guilds, human interests began to transcend those of isolated towns. The development of foreign trade gave birth logically to the Hansa (league for foreign trade) of the Netherlands, the Hanse-league of North Germany, the merchant adventurers of England (a combination of the mercers' companies of various towns), and the Corps de Métier of France. Each of these cartels (as we might call them to-day) began to have an interest first in its own home market, and secondly in foreign markets. Their interest in the exploitation of Africa and the East led not only to voyages of exploitation, but demanded national protection for such settlements as were necessary to trade. The increasing political influence of these merchant classes very soon began to give their enterprises national sanction and security. The interests of the State were linked up with the fortune of the merchant leagues, for they brought trade, prosperity, and employment to their fellow-countrymen. Hence tariffs, Navigation Acts, and a full-blown mercantilist theory sprang up, with the object of increasing national trade and limiting the competition of other countries.

CONFLICTS OF NATIONALISM

The revived interest in Roman law, which emphasised the sacred character of private property, was followed by a religious revolution, which established the right of the individual and individual conscience against the authority of the feudal Church. The Reformation and Protestantism, to which it gave birth, cut the last tie which might hold the people of various nations together.

CONFLICTS OF NATIONALISM

So was born nationalism. And so came the national language—of which I shall have more to say. When the economic transformation had crystallised into a stable system, national literature sprang up. Poets sang of their country's glory. The liberating effect of capitalism on the feudal State brought new countries into the orbit of the European world. Trade expanded, and with it men's vision of the world. The sum of human knowledge increased. National patriotism was kindled. National flags were unfurled. Religion, ethics, politics, law, took their cue from the altered state of society—the centralising tendency in the national spirit.

Nationalism, then, as we know it, has existed only for a matter of four or five hundred years, and it came in response to a revolutionary change in the mode of production and the division of labour. Unless we assume that the mode of production and the regulation of our economic lives is permanent and static, there is no reason to assume that nationalism will remain unmodified.

CONFLICTS OF NATIONALISM

The materialistic interpretation of history implies that the social, political, ethical, and legal structure of society is based fundamentally on its economic foundations. But it has been emphasised time and again that this superstructure of ideas persists long after its material basis demands a completely new ethical, political, social, and legal code. It is as if an individual in his adolescence were to continue to wear the clothes of his infancy.

I cannot explain this more clearly than by citing an example of a process contemporary and typical of our times. Fascism came into being in Italy as an expression of discontent with the chaos and disorder of the post-war period. It is true to say that there was no theoretic basis for this movement. Signor Mussolini has written in the Dictionnaire Diplomatique that Fascism did not spring from any pre-established plan. In the words of a Times leader : " It began in action against Communists and Socialists. It grew by empirical process of experiment. It made itself supreme by arbitrary methods. Then, having disposed of its rivals, it began to develop an economic system of its own, and, with an irremovable Government, it was able to elaborate it gradually as a long-term policy." There was no concrete policy, no philosophic system, preceding the change in the economic system.

CONFLICTS OF NATIONALISM

This form of government probably meets with the approval of the majority of the Italian people. There is no possible way at the moment by which we can verify this. The interesting point to us, however, is that the philosophical basis of Fascism is only just beginning to be formulated. Only now are we being regaled with treatises from the professors explaining the ideology of Fascism. I want to emphasise that the description of what Fascism is, what it purports to be, what it hopes to do, and why it is a heaven-sent solution of our difficulties, is emerging from Mussolini and the inevitable flat-footed professors years after the revolution which brought it into being. The tomfoolery of the Corporate State is only now being advanced to justify the floggings and administration of castor oil which inaugurated the birth of Fascism in Italy.

The Italians who fought for, and supported, Mussolini in his assumption of the dictatorship knew nothing, and were told nothing, of Corporate States. Instead, they were inflated by mob-oratory, with a mixture of stale Socialism and nationalistic blather as to Italy's greatness and inevitable destiny. The German imitation shows the same features. There is the same blend of distorted Socialism and drunken national fervour. If Hitler lasts, we may be sure of one thing : we shall be overwhelmed with a spate of learned treatises from solemn German professors explaining, in incredibly long and unintelligible books, the philosophic and constructive basis of German Fascism. And nobody will be more surprised than Hitler when he realises the deep erudition and philosophic probings into the structure of the State with which he must have whiled away his time painting on his ladder in Vienna.

CONFLICTS OF NATIONALISM

Violent changes in the structure of society arise, then, from dissatisfaction with the existing state of things. The chaotic and ill-understood movements which gave birth to these changes are rationalised at a later stage. What we have to grasp firmly is that such rationalisations may later give philosophic sanction to a system long after it has become unworkable. To continue with the illustration. Thousands of simple, honest people are prepared to die, and in all probability will die, for what in their opinion Fascism represents, long after its shallow pretensions and its negation of promise have become apparent even to leaders-writers of The Times. The Corporate States as the intellectual façade for gangster rule will have emerged as the hollow mockery it is, long before its credulous dupes have ceased to offer their lives in its defence.

I dwell on this ultimate connection between nationalism and economics because so frequently this relationship is denied. It is a common trick of quasi-liberals, with a smattering of Marxian theory, to begin by conceding the pivotal effect of economic forces underlying conceptions of race, religion, nationalism, and politics. Having paid lip service to this basic postulate, they qualify it by remarking that the economic motive does not explain all human actions. Nobody ever implied that it did—least of all Engels or Marx. Hesitating a little, they become bolder. They talk wisely of the time-lag between an economic system and its intellectual rationalisation—which both Engels and Marx emphasised. Finally they end by throwing over the whole bag of tricks, and leave the impression that, after all, the economic issue is a minor and unimportant factor in the history of thought. The thin veneer of liberalism wears off and the reactionary is exposed. It is a peculiar form of intellectual dishonesty characteristic of the most dangerous type of reactionary—the man who clammers on to the band-waggon of Socialism only to put sand into its wheels.

CONFLICTS OF NATIONALISM

It is perfectly clear that, in the main, millions of soldiers killed in the Great War offered up their lives from no motives of personal advancement. The German soldier did not consciously fight for increased trade and an increase in his wages any more than did the Allied soldier. He fought because he was told that the enemies of his country wanted to enslave him, to occupy his country and to take away its possessions and its greatness. In each warring country the instruments of propaganda, the Church, the Press, public speakers, and politicians, all battered unceasingly at the collective mind, beseeching, imploring, and stamping indelibly on its collective consciousness the outstanding fact that defeat meant national ruin, slavery, and oppression, and that victory meant vindication, freedom from alien rule, and individual liberty. Yet it is a saddening platitude to say now that the war was the result of national rivalries, national aggrandisements, national jealousies based fundamentally on a primitive desire for wealth, territories, and industrial supremacy.

CONFLICTS OF NATIONALISM

Sir Norman Angell maintains that such policies cannot have economic roots, that capitalists are not such fools as to believe that international wars will increase their trade or their industrial supremacy, because it is obvious that the last war did not benefit any nation commercially. Therefore, he reiterates, economic gain is not the motivating factor. It is merely the irrational human mind which is to blame, and it is only by educating this irrational human mind that we can free ourselves from its logical results.

CONFLICTS OF NATIONALISM

“ The important fact which we have to face is not what a few hundred, or a few thousand, capitalists are prepared to do in order to promote their selfish ends, but what unnumbered millions of gallant young Germans are prepared to do to promote ends that are not selfish at all, so little selfish that these youths are prepared themselves to die to the last man, in indescribable agony, to wipe half a world out of existence in that new war of the air in which half a dozen airmen, with a few gallons of poison gas, can destroy a Paris or a London, and chemists with their disease germs decimate a countryside in order that the new German culture and the Pure German Race may dominate and redeem the world and shape it to a German pattern. To describe that fact as a mere incident in the class war is to refuse to face certain ugly facts in the nature of men, the possibilities for evil of the human spirit when once it takes a wrong turning.

“ Plainly it is not first of all a problem of economics, of men following what they believe to be their interest. These millions of youngsters are not in the least interested in their economic warfare, their comfort and security ; the danger of the breakdown of civilisation would be less if they were. They are moved by values and considerations that are not economic, and we must take them into account.”

CONFLICTS OF NATIONALISM

And from another angle Mr. Bernard Joseph emphasises the same view (Nationality and its Problems) : “ The outstanding characteristic of life in a State is the apparent unity of interests, mainly economic, which the Government of the State is expected to serve. The suggestion that such community of interests is a factor of nationality is supported by the argument that nothing has a more persistent and constant effect on the life of a community than its economic interests, in consequence of which groups of people will tend to be mutually attracted. The fallacy of this argument is that such community of interests, whilst it is indeed a factor of importance in the everyday life of the individual comprising any nationality, does not affect a nationality in its corporate capacity. Where economic interests and requirements of the nationality come into conflict it can readily be established that economics invariably give way to national necessity. It has been shown, times without number, that the greatest business combines of financial and industrial groups of two different nations do not avail to maintain amity between the nations, or to prevent armed conflict, if a question of national honour arise between them which is a casus belli.

“ Even with a nationality, economic interests are not always identical, yet such divergence of economic interest does not in any way tend to disintegrate the nationality. Who is not familiar with the situation in certain countries, where the industrial section of the population is aggressively eager for tariff protection, whilst the agricultural element is bitterly opposed to it? Although such dissimilarity of economic interests may be the subject-matter of the most acrimonious political battles within the State, the members of the nationality, or nationalities, comprising the State do not become estranged from each other, or sundered on the lines of such divergence of interests."

CONFLICTS OF NATIONALISM

These are classic examples of examining a problem by standing on one's head to survey it. First as to Mr. Joseph. Whose economic interests are represented in modern Governments? Those of manufacturers, industrialists, big landowners, or those of workers, agricultural labourers, and petty tradesmen? And when it comes to a clash between these interests, which of them is represented as in the nation's interest? "Divergence of economic interest does not in any way tend to disintegrate the nationality," he writes. But in point of fact it does. Witness all revolutionary wars, culminating in the most recent one—the Austrian Civil War. And do not riots in the agrarian areas of the United States indicate angry resentment with the industrial East? Does this show calm acquiescence in legislation presumably in the "national interest"?

CONFLICTS OF NATIONALISM

And, because Sir Norman Angell's gallant young Germans are seduced into thinking that their own interests lie in setting Europe ablaze, whilst in reality they are fighting to preserve the economic interests of their rulers—Messrs. Thyssen & Co.—does this mean that economic interest does not rule their lives? A healthy man is not aware of the action of his heart, yet he is alive because his heart beats.

"Some of the bourgeoisie," writes Carlton Hayes, in what is perhaps the sanest book ever written on nationalism, "particularly bourgeois politicians, made a very interesting discovery about the phenomenon of nationalism. They found that the masses, when brought under its spell, not only were less inclined to criticise their leaders, but also were disposed to accept the status quo in economic matters. On the multitudes nationalism could be made to act as a sort of laughing-gas. If a labourer could be induced to take a long, deep breath of it he would feel quite exhilarated, and for a time, at any rate, he would forget about overwork and underpay in factory, field, or mine, and lose the reality of his own squalid habitation in the dream of national greatness. A sustained inhalation of nationalism, as in time of national election or international war, might even deaden the noise of Socialists, anarchists, and other apostles of social revolution or economic unrest."

CONFLICTS OF NATIONALISM

What is it that gives rise to the ugly manifestation of nationalism? The answer is best given in a series of propositions. Nationalism expressed the general economic interest a hundred years ago. The modern State, the so-called democratic State, is controlled by vested interests created in that period—industrialists, bankers, and the big landholders. This class, having political power, controlling the organs of propaganda—the Press, wireless and so on—is able by these means to persuade the whole nation that the material and spiritual welfare of all its inhabitants is bound up in perpetuation of the national State. This class, which in effect is the State, exploits, consciously or unconsciously, the sentiment of nationalism to its own economic benefit. When their interests are threatened, they talk of the harm it will do the nation. Thus Socialism and Communism are usually un-British, un-American and un-French. When an imperialist war comes, it is not a war for trade but a war of national vindication. The contradictions of nationalism rest on the contradictions of the economic system. As we shall see later, the conflicts of nationalism disappear when the contradictions of the economic system are ironed out. Both forces are kept static by those in whose interest it is to keep them static. Sir Norman Angell is really expressing impatience because these contradictions are not perceived by the class which is exploited to keep them static.

CONFLICTS OF NATIONALISM

“Not until it is realised that economics can only come second or third, and that factors of ethics and race must come first, will there be understanding of the causes of the present unhappiness, or a possibility of discovering means and methods of curing it.” These words are from the pen of that profound philosopher, Adolf Hitler. There is no greater proof of the success which attends organised propaganda than the career of this humourless simulacrum of a national leader. He has placed on record his estimate of the gullibility of the masses. What a striking comment on this gullibility is the fact that a great nation has succumbed to a doctrine which preaches the supremacy of the aristocratic principle in life, and finds itself led by a Hitler !

The Germans and Italians are told that economics comes second or even third—the race must come first. This is the new religion. In point of fact, it is the old religion masquerading as the new. The wretchedly paid worker, in factory or mine, is told that what comes first is the struggle of his race for supremacy, not his own personal struggle for security, just as his ancestor was told that a Supreme Being had ordained his poverty and the wealth of his feudal lord. Observe that this race, which he must venerate now as he did his God, consists of blonds, brunettes, workmen, manufacturers, tramps, millionaires, peasants, atheists, religious maniacs, people with bad digestions and good, geniuses and mental defectives. This motley collection must be united in aim. They now have a mission. They are all members of a great race superior to other races.

CONFLICTS OF NATIONALISM

Article 1 of the Italian Charter of Labour, issued in April 1927, states: "The Italian nation is an organism possessing a purpose, a life, and instruments of action superior to, though possessed by, the individuals, or groups of individuals, who compose it. The nation is a moral, political, and economic unit integrally embodied in the Fascist State." Here is an exact analogy between the attributes of God and that of the nation, even to the Trinity—moral, political, and economic unity.

According to this view, each and every individual is expected to have as much stake in the glory of his country as his neighbour. The miner earning two pounds a week in the Rhondda Valley must prostrate himself to this jealous God of Nationalism equally with the great landowner who draws royalties from the coal seams on his property. And, when his nation goes to war, he must defend with his life the hovel in which he lives, as well as the estate of his landlord, for does he not share in the glory and traditions of his race? Do not the poets, painters, and scientists of his country belong to him as well as to his exploiter?

CONFLICTS OF NATIONALISM

It is easy, too easy, to sneer at nationalism. From being a liberating force it has enslaved humanity. It makes the British coal-miner see as his brother, not the German coal-miner who sweats underground for as wretched a pittance, but the British mine-owner. It blinds the British farmer, struggling for a living from the soil, to the fact that the American farmer is facing the same uncertainties, crushed in the same way by debt burdens, and saddled similarly with a host of parasitic middlemen.

Nationalism in capitalist countries implies an inherent faith in the importance of nationality, a belief that civilisation is best served through the competitive activities of nations in the fields of industry, science, art, literature, and music. It connotes a feeling of superiority and an exaltation of power of one nation over another. It shows itself in the fostering of patriotism, and in its basest form exploits the idea of a pure race which in some way is ordained by God, or the Cosmic Force, as the only fit one to bear the torch of civilisation. Carried to its logical conclusion, and in keeping with its philosophy, it justifies the conquest and subordination of "inferior" peoples. It has been the ethical justification of slavery in America and Africa, of serfdom in medieval Europe and Russia, and it is used even to this day to justify intervention by so-called civilised races in Manchuria and Africa.

CONFLICTS OF NATIONALISM

Bound up in the intangible content of nationalism is the urge of national traditions, national customs, and a national language. No national movement is complete without a language question. Witness Hebrew in Palestine, Gaelic in Ireland, Afrikaans in South Africa, and the language difficulties in Belgium, Poland, Czecho-Slovakia, etc.

When we contemplate the use to which the average specimen of homo sapiens puts his language we may wonder faintly what all the pother is about. The novels of the late Mr. Edgar Wallace, the leaders of the Daily Mail and Daily Express, the masterpieces of Hollywood, the crooning of theme-songs over the wireless, the process of eating and drinking interspersed with amorous interludes and the begetting of young, the exchange of the current dirty story, the discussion on the relative merits of different makes of motor-cars—all these would sound equally profound and significant in English or in Hindustani. It seems unnecessary to dig up Gaelic, Hebrew, and Afrikaans merely to play Gaelic, Hebrew, and Afrikaans variations on the above themes. The detached observer, faced with the passionate declamations of the language enthusiasts, the modern resurrection-men, confronted with the loud and incessant propaganda, which would have him believe that the masses yearn for their neglected languages more than for anything else in the world, may be forgiven if he politely represses a snigger. Nevertheless, it has to be faced. The language racket is in full swing. All over the world new discordant noises jar on sensitive ears, and philologists are happily engaged in finding local equivalents for necking, petting, gasoline, gangster, and carboxy-hæmoglobin. The new Tower of Babel is being built, and only the faithful are to be entrusted with its building.

CONFLICTS OF NATIONALISM

“ Before the development of political nationalism in modern times, speech was simply the natural means of expression, not an instrument of policy. The people spoke a dialect that bound them, not with the State and its pursuit of power, but with the home and village ; the State and science employed a supra-national language scarcely spoken by any people. It is modern nationalism that raised the popular speech to the language of literature and the State. Fichte made the intimate connection between nationality and language the starting-point of this theory of nationalism. In the State of the nineteenth century, which had become what it never had been before—the highest form of organisation of the nation, which identified itself with the State—the national language became a constitutional function, the means of the will of the nation to dominance. Where the State embraced several peoples there now developed an oppression, unknown until then, of the other peoples by the nation that identified itself with the State; this nation's dominance in the State found expression in the position given to its language.

CONFLICTS OF NATIONALISM

“ The laws concerning the use of the official language in Czecho-Slovakia or Poland, which figure so prominently in the constitutional law of these countries, depress the minority peoples—through the subordinate position given to their language—to citizens of an inferior class, deprive them of many otherwise natural rights, and hit them in the most sensitive place. The struggle for the privileged position of the official language in administration and justice, in school and in parliament, is the favourite scene of the orgies of nationalism. It is over this question that the national zeal of the minority populations flares up, that the struggle for the right and the prestige of peoples is waged, that the national element of the language of the people is turned into a hotly contested political instrument.

CONFLICTS OF NATIONALISM

“ In pre-revolutionary Russia the Russian language was the one and only official language, and the principal means employed in the attempt to de-nationalise the non-Russian populations. The proletarian State, no longer the expression of the will to dominance of a nation, no longer recognises an official language, the constitutionally established privilege of a particular language. In the Soviet Union there is no talk of an official language, but only of languages in general use, all of which have equal rights. Every population has the right to use its own language in Government offices and courts of justice, in Soviet and school. All proclamations and notices are framed in the language of the region or district. Language thus ceases to be an object of policy or a question of power. It loses nothing in this way in cultural value, but a good deal politically in emotional appeal. Now that the Russian language is no longer privileged or imposed, it is developing by free consent into a lingua franca for the multi-lingual Union ” (Hans Kohn, Nationalism in the Soviet Union).

But in capitalist countries nationalism is a religion, and even to question the sanctity of language or traditions, or to suggest that culture may mean something which depends upon bread and butter, is like impugning the credentials of the Pope.

CONFLICTS OF NATIONALISM

If this seems the language of hyperbole, I would beg the reader to watch the indignation on the face of any language fanatic when it is suggested to him that what really matters to him is not freedom from an alien language and alien tradition so much as freedom from economic insecurity. Suggest to such an individual that, if he were living in a community where he could live in civilised surroundings, in a decent home, with good schools for his children, absolute freedom from worry as to his future, or that of his wife and children and enough leisure, that he might want to know and love not one language but many—that he might come to appreciate the history, customs and traditions not only of his own tribe but that of many others—suggest this, I say, to your purveyor of sacred languages, listen to the apoplectic response and you will perceive that rational thinking enters very little into the argument. It has become now an affair of the spirit and, like all affairs of the spirit, difficult to influence by reason.

The groups which comprise a nationalist movement in any country present fairly constant features. At the head is a small band of fanatical leaders. They are passionately sincere ; and nationalism replaces for them that devoted love of religion which in previous ages would have made them inquisitors. Quite frequently, indeed, they are ministers of religion. As a rule they are stern, unbending, humourless, just as religious fanatics rarely show a sense of humour. These few individuals, like other religious counterparts, are so extreme in their views that they make even their followers uncomfortable at times. They burn with religious zeal. Their motives are honest as a rule, and free from thought of personal and material gain, and when eventually the movement succeeds and they are given positions of authority, they are helpless in the grip of the second group.

CONFLICTS OF NATIONALISM

The second section comprises the lawyers and leaders of commerce: the traders, manufacturers, well-to-do farmers, and professional classes, who see in a nationalist movement the possibility of lucrative openings—diplomatic posts, appointments to the Army and Navy and to the Civil Service, tariffs, and so on. It is this group which exploits a nationalist movement mercilessly.

The third group—factory workers, small salaried classes, shop assistants, farm labourers, and petty tradesmen—forms the largest numerically. They go to meetings and lectures, where they are subjected to mob oratory, mob enthusiasm, even as their forbears listened with open mouths to religious leaders. They fight and die for nationalism, and, when they are "free and independent," they remain slaves to the same economic forces. The enemy is not recognised as clearly as before. They are now a "united nation," and it takes much longer to make them realise that exploitation is as uncomfortable for them under the domination of their own people as it was under foreign rule.

CONFLICTS OF NATIONALISM

To nationalists the nation has a destiny—a corporate, spiritual existence as real as the vision of God to the mystic. Consider for a moment the reality behind the image. You gather a group of individuals of all shapes and sizes, of all kinds and morals, short-headed, long-headed, divided into classes with conflicting interests, and you endow them with some mystic, spiritual destiny, some eternal purpose. Their survival as a group takes on sacred sanctions ; their flags, their anthems, their uniforms, all embody some mysterious force which would appear to defy analysis.

No wonder Sir Norman Angell is puzzled by the strange faces which nationalism wears ; that he is reduced to saying that what "men desire as the fruit of political effort is so subject to violent changes (usually the result of suggestion acting upon the semi-conscious or unconscious) that what we will die for in January we become indifferent about in December.

"In view, therefore, of the ever-changing motives of action, any attempt to forecast the course of either German or Italian Fascism, of the American New Deal, or of Russia's relations to the world at large (and some assumption is necessary in order to formulate any policy of our own) in the familiar terms of the crude conflict of economic interest between well-defined and neatly labelled classes--'Proletariat v. Capitalists'—or the economic rivalry of nations, is simply to ignore plain facts of the world around us of everyday experience. The theory that the course of events is determined by the economic interests of groups of nations implies at least that such groups of nations realise their interest. If, while intending to be guided by its interest, a class persistently mistakes the interest and acts upon a mistake, then it is not economic interest which determines behaviour, but the force, whatever it may be, which causes the mistake to be made and the intention to miscarry, a force which may not be economic in character at all" (Time and Tide, January 6th, 1934).

CONFLICTS OF NATIONALISM

Thus, on the same reasoning, if a man is told his house is on fire and jumps into a taxi to go there, and is carried by the taxi-driver five miles away from the scene of the fire, it is not his anxiety as to his belongings which gave the impetus to his movements ; it is the taxi.

This is typical of a great deal of writing and thought on this subject. What appears to be a piece of theoretical and academic reasoning results in an attitude of mind which faces the necessity for radical change and revolution with misgivings, doubts, and hesitations.

CONFLICTS OF NATIONALISM

Let me put the problem involved as simply as possible. The fundamental standpoint of the economic determinists is that man must eat and drink before he begins to indulge in the luxury of religion, law, politics, art, and philosophy, and that the forms which these mental diversions take are coloured and conditioned by the manner in which he procures his food and drink. That if the manner in which he gets his food and drink undergoes a transformation, this specific change will influence later his religious values, his systems of philosophy, his code of ethics, his laws, and his political institutions. And, most important of all, if the laws, customs, political institutions, codes of ethics, etc., in force are still in harmony with his former mode of procuring food and drink, it will produce contradictions, upheavals, and revolutions until the vested interests which retain power in the old system are replaced by the class with vested interests in the new. Note that all I say is that the determining factor in producing these clashes of rival interests is economic change or an economic revolution, if you like—such a revolution as the Industrial Revolution. The form these clashes assume, and whether they achieve their object in the transference of power, are unpredictable, and depend, in the long run, on such accidental factors as leadership, the degree of knowledge and wisdom in the contesting classes. All these considerations make it impossible to forecast how soon, and in what manner, the new class attains its ascendancy. And, whatever one may say of Marx, Engels, and Lenin, none of these ever pretended to be political astrologers or rivals to Old Moore, except in the very broadest manner.

CONFLICTS OF NATIONALISM

Sir Norman Angell says economic interests and class war can have nothing to do with the motivating force of men's actions, because, if they did, they would not use methods calculated to lose the very things for which they are struggling. And it is this fundamental mistake of confusing cause and effect which leads him into his intellectual morass. For it is a morass. Once you deny the vital significance of the economic background (and I emphasise again and again the word vital) and fall back on the complexities of the results of "suggestion acting upon the semi-conscious or unconscious [sic]" for your explanation, then you are doomed to the intellectual position of a sane man fallen among lunatics—a rational creature surrounded by illogical and irrational animals, you are left in the position that you can have no change, you cannot hope to achieve a regeneration until you have educated the vast majority of mankind to your way of thinking. And, in point of fact, this is the position of most harassed liberals. They sigh helplessly when confronted with the futilities of the present day, and their only panacea is education ! education ! And so Sir Norman Angell wastes his splendid talents in dispelling illusions which persist as realities.

CONFLICTS OF NATIONALISM

He can never have read his Engels : “ What all these fellows lack is dialectic. They see only cause here, only effect there. They do not see that all this method of viewing things results in bare abstractions ; that in the real world such metaphysical polar opposites exist only in crucial situations ; that the whole great process develops itself in the form of reciprocal action —of very unequal forces, to be sure, but in which the economic movement is far and away the strongest, most primary and decisive. They do not see that here nothing is absolute and everything relative. For them Hegel has never existed.”

The cynical, worldly wise critics of social revolutionaries sometimes concede the validity of such an analysis. They fall back on the argument that we believe what we wish to believe, and make our arguments suit our beliefs. “ You, who wish to see the world a different place, with comfort, cleanliness, and security for all, fashion for yourselves a political creed with arguments to match, and call it Communism. I, who like the world as it is, with its contrasts of joy and despair, its high lights and its grey drabness, am violently opposed to what seems to me the sameness, the orderliness, and the bleakness of your world ; and I talk of the menace of Communism and its evil growth." So run the arguments. We rationalise our instincts.

CONFLICTS OF NATIONALISM

" If this is so," say such critics, " what is the use of anything ? Why enter into the fights and struggles of the market-place ? Let us, like wise men, enjoy what we can, live our lives pleasantly as we can (such critics usually are able to lead pleasant lives), ignoring the pandemonium of the mob." Let us suppose that they are right—that we think as it pleases us to think—that, in other words, what suits our book becomes transformed by rationalisation into a system of philosophy which justifies us in holding on to it. What is this, then, but another proof of materialist motives colouring our mode of thought ?

And is the Communist not right when he regards the seeming liberal as a greater danger than the confirmed reactionary ? For, on the above argument, worthy liberals like Sir Norman Angell, Sir Arthur Salter, or Mr. John

CONFLICTS OF NATIONALISM

Maynard Keynes, having examined Communism and found the system unworkable or distasteful, must obviously have started their investigation with a bias against it, and are therefore much more dangerous to the cause because they start off with a pretence of being fair, whilst in fact they desire Communism as little as Lord Beaverbrook and Lord Rothermere.

The argument, of course, is not as nonsensical as it sounds. It is true that only the inexorable logic of economic breakdown will breed a desire for change in most people, but it is unlikely that we shall ever be exhorted by the Daily Mail and Daily Express to take off our hats to Russia—not, at all events, whilst these pillars of Empire continue to pay a dividend.

I have devoted a great deal of space to what may appear to be an academic discussion. But it is of vital significance to a discussion of anti-Semitism, for several reasons.

First, the emergence of nationalism as a political question of the first magnitude has created for the Jew a complication comparable only to the birth of Christianity. The new religion has served to emphasise his strangeness, his demarcation from the rest of the world, as effectively as did the coming of the older religion. It has given his enemies a new weapon. From being the infidel, he is now the internationalist. And to be suspected of internationalism is almost as bad as to be suspected of being involved in the white-slave traffic. To the ardent nationalist a man holding internationalist views is akin to some sort of spiritual eunuch—an anæmic nondescript with ink in his veins instead of red blood.

CONFLICTS OF NATIONALISM

Secondly, as if in answer to such accusations, the Jew is now developing his own national consciousness. It is in accentuation of his own nationalism that he seeks salvation, and it is to that development which we must now turn.

ZIONISM

FROM what has been said in the previous chapter, it ought not to occasion any surprise that the Jews did not begin to consider the territorial implications of nationalism until the middle of the nineteenth century. Zionist writers date their nationalistic yearnings from the dim, remote past, but, apart from pious aspiration and sporadic settlement in the Holy Land by occasional fugitives in search of a final resting-place on holy soil, no real corporate action occurred until the eighties of the last century.

Zionist historians are almost all unanimous in declaring that the exacerbation of anti-Semitism which occurred at that time in Germany, Russia, and Eastern Europe was responsible for its inception. A little reflection will show that this reason for the growth of the Zionist ideal is historically false. If persecution in itself bred a desire for territorial isolation, we should have had a Jewish State years ago, since anti-Semitism has existed for centuries. "The history of Israel is a story of lost opportunities," wrote Zangwill. There were many periods in their chequered history when it would have been feasible for Jews to erect their own State, even in Palestine. Joseph Nasi, Duke of Naxos, attempted to found a Jewish settlement in Tiberias, which had been granted him by his friend and patron, the Sultan of Turkey, not many years after the expulsion from Spain. But the scheme came to nothing.

ZIONISM

It was the growth of nationalism in their neighbours which really converted the formal "next year in Palestine" of the prayer-book into practical designs on the homeland. The emancipation of the Balkan countries from Turkish domination, the growth of Russian nationalism and Pan-Slavism, could not but have its effect on thoughtful Jews. Nationalism, as I have pointed out, is of recent growth (much more recent in Eastern Europe), and Zionism, as a manifestation of nationalism, is a logical extension of that nationalism which gave it birth.

It would be serving no useful purpose to recapitulate in this book the history of the Zionist movement. For objective study, however, it is necessary to obtain a clear picture of what its most ardent supporters anticipate from the establishment of a national home in Palestine, though the necessity for bringing theory and practice into alignment demands that we judge it not by what its adherents expect from it, but by the practical outcome of their efforts.

ZIONISM

The two schools of thought, the "politicals" and the "practicals," which before the war and the Balfour Declaration bitterly divided the Zionist movement, have since then reconciled their differences. The "politicals," led by Herzl, demanded a "publicly assured, legally guaranteed" Jewish State before any corporate action on the part of international Jewry was initiated. Their work, thus, was concentrated on diplomatic manœuvres, the obtaining of charters and concessions, and the organisation of a powerful movement which could negotiate for these objectives. The "practical" Zionists, recognising the difficulties, always insisted that what was needed even more urgently was the fostering of a nationalist spirit in the Jewish communities of the Diaspora, as well as the establishment of a cultural nidus in Palestine, which would serve as a spiritual centre for the whole of Jewry. Later I shall have more to say of "spiritual centres," because to-day it is an argument used to the exclusion of all others by Zionists. For the present it is necessary to explain the paradox of a group which labelled itself "practical" having as its aim the establishment of a spiritual centre.

The most eloquent of the "practicals" was Achad Ha'am (Asher Ginzburg), who must be regarded as the philosopher of the modern Jewish nationalist movement. For him the historic mission of the Jew is to keep steadily before the world that uncompromising spirit of pure reason and absolute justice characteristic of the Hebrew prophets. He regards Hebraism as a philosophy which inspires its followers to a striving after the unattainable ideals of absolute truth and absolute justice. For him, then, Zionism means the establishment of a centre of Jewish thought where the Hebrew genius can translate this philosophy into practical form for civilisation. He insists on Palestine as the centre, on soil which nourished Moses, Isaiah, and Amos, holding that the twin forces of assimilation and persecution render such a flowering of genuine culture impossible in exile.

ZIONISM

This philosophy is, of course, purely idealistic in character. To the dialectic materialist such notions of absolute truth and absolute justice are fantastic. Truth and justice are relative notions measured by such standards as are available at any given period, and to assume that it is exclusively a function of the Hebraic mind to supply such standards sounds suspiciously like a philosophic rationalisation of a belief in a Chosen People. Whether it is enunciated by a thinker and philosopher like Achad Ha'am, or by such nationalist swashbucklers as Maurice Samuel and Ludwig Lewisohn, the effect is not so far removed from that of the "Aryan" pseudo-philosophers as one might imagine. Since, however, the majority of Zionists readily accepted this view of the Jewish mission, the slow upbuilding of a Jewish community, with the development of Hebrew as a national language, became a much more practical undertaking than interviewing Turkish sultans and obtaining charters. Hence those who believed in the spiritual mission of Israel, rather than in the transference of Jews who were unwelcome in one country to a country of their own, became known as the "practicals."

ZIONISM

I have said that the Balfour Declaration perforce made all Zionists "practicals," because the creation of a purely Jewish State in Palestine is now regarded as only a remote possibility. That Declaration, and its subsequent interpretations, has resulted in Zionism becoming largely a Jewish mission to the Arabs. If many Jews have benefited from Zionism, a larger number of Arabs have benefited equally, and at no expense to themselves. Such momentum as the Jewish revival of Palestine has given to the renaissance of its Arab population must inevitably continue to re-vitalise and re-populate this section of its community.

For Jewish writers, then, to talk of Palestine being to the Jews what Ireland is to the Irish is to ignore the fact that, in Ireland, the Irish are not in the minority, and that, save for Ulster and the fast diminishing Anglo-Irish Protestant group, Ireland is not, and never has been, faced with the problem of a group differing in religion, economic standards, and education which, Sinbad-like, an active minority is to carry on its back.

ZIONISM

There is a mass of Zionist literature and propaganda available differing in no way in its claims from that of any nationalist literature. The religious enthusiasm and hope engendered by the Balfour Declaration have been damped a great deal by the limitations and restrictions imposed by the Mandatory Power in the interests of the Arabs, who have caught the nationalist fever themselves. It is true that most Zionists declare that Zionism by itself cannot solve the Jewish problem, but there is no doubt that the movement is held up as the one constructive and corporate effort which Jews are able to make themselves towards its elucidation. It must be our task to see in what way this object can be achieved.

Everybody is agreed—even the most fanatic of Zionists—that Palestine cannot become the national home of even the majority of the 16 million Jews spread over the world. Dr. Ruppin, in a sanguine estimate, forecasts a population of half a million by 1943 in Palestine, allowing for natural increase. "Three per cent of world Jewry would live in Palestine, forming about 30 per cent of its population." So that, in an appraisal of Zionism, due consideration must be given not only to the small group in Palestine, but to the overwhelming majority in other countries. If the number of Jews in Palestine grows, it grows equally in the Dispersion.

ZIONISM

First, as to the outlook for Jews settling in Palestine. The relative prosperity of Palestine, despite the economic crisis, has attracted a number of settlers with capital, and the exodus from Germany to Palestine of 8,000 settlers in 1933 includes a fair number with private means. About $7\frac{1}{2}$ per cent of the cultivable land is now owned by Jews ; 25 per cent of this is owned by the National Fund and is out of reach of private enterprise. There is no doubt that the influx of a large number of middle-class families has resulted in a great deal of speculation in land, inflation of property values, and feverish building activity. William Zukerman writes (Harper's Magazine, May 1933) : "The canker of private greed from which Zionism was hitherto singularly free is now creeping into and corrupting it. Its previous public spirit is passing into a spirit of private gain and of narrow group interests.

ZIONISM

Everybody seems to be wanting to get something out of Zionism, instead of giving to it. Dividends are beginning to play an important part in Zionist propaganda. The germ of greed has been injected into a great social movement, and the big ideal behind it is being changed into the small coin of petty selfishness, and selfish reaction of a decaying and non-productive class."

We may take for granted that the increasing economic and social disabilities of Jews will result in still greater migration of Jewish capital to Palestine, and an accelerated growth in private enterprise. It is already being noted that the price of land has been forced up so greatly that the National Fund has been seriously handicapped in its steady policy of acquiring land, which is to be the inalienable property of the Jewish people. Palestine for some time will be a haven of refuge for tired capital fleeing from small returns and reduced dividends. The economic structure of Palestine must take its shape accordingly. It is interesting to see the reaction of Labour Zionists to this development. Dr. Ruppin writes : " Labour realises that under present conditions capital is needed for creating an economic basis in Palestine, and therefore does not, in principle, oppose private economic activities. But it demands that the opportunities for labour created by Jewish capital should benefit Jewish workmen, and that they should be paid wages required to secure the minimum standard of a civilised existence. Their demands have been successful in industry, and to a great extent in the plantation-colonies, even where the employers could have obtained non-Jewish labour at lower wages.

ZIONISM

“ This deviation from economic principles on the part of the employers is explained by the fact that most of them emigrated to Palestine from Zionist, rather than from economic, motives, and consider it their duty to create employment for other Jews. It remains to be seen whether in the future the common national interests of employers and employees will suffice to overcome their conflicting economic interests, and whether, in the face of competition from non-Jewish employers inside and outside Palestine, the Jewish employers will be willing and able to satisfy the demands of Jewish labour. Hitherto many Jewish employers have been able to pay higher wages, because they found exceptionally good markets for their produce (e.g. oranges), or because the new industries introduced by them met with no local opposition, or because their Jewish customers paid higher prices for their produce than for similar non-Jewish produce. But this is not a safe or permanent basis.

ZIONISM

“ Propaganda for Jewish produce will not work in export trade, and it will be hard to solve the problem of how the claim of the Jewish workman to an adequate wage is to be reconciled with the rules of free competition in a capitalist world. A partial solution may be found, possibly, by the Jewish workmen adapting themselves to the conditions of the country, and by an extension of co-operatives reducing their cost of living, so that, with lower money wages, real wages may yet remain at the same level.”

As Zukerman points out, the Zionist movement at one time did show signs of constructive planning on a collectivist basis. The experiments in land communes were a success before kolkhoz became a fashionable word. But there can be no doubt that for a long time to come the social and economic structure of Palestine will be identical with that of other capitalist countries. A cross-section of the Palestinian population now, or for years to come, would show society divided into classes : a financial and land-owning oligarchy, a middle-class stratum comprising petty traders, rentiers, and professional men, and an industrial and agricultural proletariat.

Achad Ha'am's dream will assume reality. “ Palestine will be a national spiritual centre of Judaism to which all Jews will turn with affection, and which will bind all Jews together ; a centre of study and learning, of language and literature, of bodily work and spiritual purification ; a true miniature of the people of Israel as it ought to be, so that every Hebrew in the Diaspora will think it a privilege to behold just once ‘ the centre of Judaism,’ and, when he returns home, will say to his friends : ‘ If you wish to see the genuine type of a Jew, whether it be a rabbi or a scholar or writer, a farmer or an artist or business man, then go to Palestine and you will see it.’ ”

ZIONISM

Now this show-window notion of Zionism, if one may term it so, is one that crops up regularly in Zionist writings. We are to see in Palestine really Jewish agricultural labourers and Jewish landowners. Jewish manufacturers and live Jewish workmen, honest-to-God Jewish politicians and Jewish railway porters. In short, Palestine is to reveal to the world something which nobody need ever have doubted—that the Jews could create a State in which all the anomalies and contradictions of capitalist civilisation could be reproduced. Thus one good Zionist is reported to have said, in a lecture, that he did not mind very much the strife between the Labour Party and the Revisionists (Jewish Fascists), for these divisions made Jewish life interesting and more attractive. The smug satisfaction with which these lyric songsters of Jewish nationalism survey the reduplication of all the evils which created their movement contrasts oddly with their professed intentions of building in Palestine a State which is to be a model to the world of what a State should be.

ZIONISM

Herein lies the strongest criticism of the Zionist movement. Awakened late to the illusion that in super-nationalism lies the cure of all their ills, the Jews arrive on parade, dishevelled and out of breath, to find that the show is nearly over. It will be small consolation to the Jewish worker in Palestine when he discovers that his exploiter is a Jewish employer. Nor, when Jewish capital creates its reservoir of unemployed, as it inevitably must, will the unemployed Jew regard his plight with resignation because he is now starving on Jewish soil. And if he comforts himself with the thought that at least he is free from pogroms, his own Jewish Fascist movement will soon enough repair that deficiency.

"Unbelievable as it may sound," writes Zukerman, "a Zionist Hitler movement, fully rigged out, except for Hitler's anti-Semitism, is actually in existence now in Palestine, in Poland, and in most European countries. Its members parade in brown shirts, drill in preparation for some imaginary war ; engage in strike-breaking ; foster a bellicose attitude towards the Arab population and against the Mandatory Power ; exacerbate class-passions, and hound every liberal Zionist leader from public life. They make strong inroads into the Zionist Press and capture important positions within the movement. They were a sufficiently strong force at the last Zionist Congress at Basle to force the resignation of Mr. Weizmann ; the indications are that they will be a still stronger force at the next congress in 1933, and that their policy of political aggression, social reaction, and the economic restoration of the small trader will become dominant in the Zionist movement. For Zionism is essentially a middle-class movement, susceptible to all the tendencies emanating from, and affecting, the middle class. Hitherto it clung to Liberalism, the product of a nineteenth-century victorious middle class ; now it is veering to Fascism, the twentieth-century manifestation of the same class, in despair."

ZIONISM

" We are the strongest of all the non-Socialist parties within the Zionist movement," states Mr. Vladimir Jabotinsky, the leader of the Revisionist faction, " and we are the only party in which the suffering Jewish middle class, the backbone of the nation, believes. Within the next few years we shall become the leading force in Zionism."

The Jewish Chronicle of March 16th, 1934, records the beginnings of the clash between these conflicting groups : " Following upon the fighting between Labourites and Revisionists at Haifa and Tel-Aviv, reported in recent issues, come reports of widely separated outbreaks at Hedera and Rehoboth. The trouble at Hedera is attributed to dissatisfaction among the members of the Palestine Labour Federation (Histadruth Haovim), at the allocation of building work there to Revisionist labourers, contrary to an agreement last September that jobs are to be distributed through the medium of the Trade Union Labour Exchange. Labourites picketed the building and refused to disperse. Fourteen local leaders of the Moatzat Avoda were thereupon arrested. The Revisionists are continuing work under police protection. The arrested persons have been ordered to pay a fine of £10, failing which they will go to prison for one month.

ZIONISM

" The magistrate, in pronouncing sentence, remarked that he made it so severe because the authorities were determined to put a stop to these frequent disputes and clashes.

" At Rehoboth a number of Brith Trumpeldorites are reported to have been injured, and two Labourites have been arrested, following a clash between the two groups over their respective claims to employment. Brith

ZIONISM

Trumpeldorites had started work on a building there, which, it was alleged, was an infringement of an agreement made by the contractors to engage their workers through the union.

“Here also the Revisionists are continuing work under police protection.

“Six Labourites were arrested for obstructing the police and refusing to disperse. They were taken to Acre Gaol, together with ten of the Moatzat Avodim leaders of Hedera, who have refused to pay their fines. They will probably be bailed out pending an appeal.

“All-day negotiations seeking to bring about a settlement of the dispute have been unsuccessful.”

We may now arrive at some estimate of the spiritual emanation likely to issue from a social order mimicking in every respect the political, social, and economic structure of other capitalist countries. For observe that your Zionist claims that in the establishment of a national home in Palestine, in the wedding of a people to its ancient soil, lie the potentialities of a great spiritual regeneration which is to revive the drooping courage and national pride of the exiled Jew. An awe-inspired world is to be shown that the Jew can once again stagger it with products of his genius comparable to the Bible and Christianity. From the loins of the Jewish State will spring such achievements as will justify the years of travail, the sacrifice, the blood and tears of pioneers who built, and are building, Zionism in Palestine with their bleeding hands. (In passing, I note that it is always the poets and publicists who talk of "building up the land with bleeding hands.")

ZIONISM

It is the fashion to-day to talk of national art, national culture, and national literature when, in point of fact, art, culture, and literature are rapidly being internationalised. The problems with which the French philosopher deals are similar to those of his German colleague. The life which the American novelist records differs only in detail from that of his readers in England, France, or Germany. Your Yiddish or Hebrew writer reflects his own order of society as much as does the Spanish or Japanese writer, and if the order of society in a Hebrew State is the same as in any other State, his art or culture will have no peculiar virtue, except that it is transcribed into Hebrew. The only experimental deviations in art to-day are, significantly enough, Russian. I shall have more to say on this elsewhere.

We may discount largely the optimism of the nationalists who hope to use Palestine as a means of demonstrating what Jewish genius and Jewish art can show when rooted in its own soil. There is no reason to assume that the products of Jewish genius will multiply when it is transplanted to Palestine. There is a quality of obstinacy in genius which makes it unamenable alike to the methods of the forcing-house and the rigours of oppression.

ZIONISM

Palestine has served to absorb refugees from countries unable to absorb them. It will continue to do so, and in this it has justified itself. Zionists are indignant when Palestine is regarded as an asylum, but the fact remains that the Jewish population has increased only as a result of the exacerbation of anti-Semitism elsewhere. It will not be denied that if the European economic order had remained stable, and if the emancipation of Western Jewry had extended to the countries in which the mediæval position of the Jew persisted, there would have been no such augmentation of Palestinian Jewry as we are witnessing to-day. . . . It is true that no relative stability and political enlightenment could have emerged from a world shattered by international war. But the fact remains that Palestine waxes as the lot of the Jew in the Diaspora wanes. Such growth is in the nature of things subject to limitations, not the least of which, as we have seen, is the growth of nationalism among the Arabs. And the Arabs, besides possessing a numerical advantage, enjoy powerful political support.

How will Palestine affect the millions of Jews who will not, or cannot, be accommodated there? Zionists maintain that in the building up of Palestine lies a corporate task, which will serve as the cement binding together Jews, who, with the decay of religion, were fast being lost to Judaism through assimilation. Such a concrete task will not only stay the disintegrating forces of assimilation, but will act as a constant reminder to Jews of their racial identity, and will bolster up their national consciousness and national pride. The achievements of Jews in Palestine will create respect in the minds of their enemies, and so lessen anti-Semitism. Palestine will give the Jews a voice in international politics and enable them to defend Jewish interests elsewhere.

ZIONISM

We may deal with the last argument first. The achievements of the Japanese in building up, in a short period, a mighty State, complete with all modern appurtenances, such as an army and navy, compare very favourably with the Herculean efforts of the Jewish pioneers. Yet in spite of this the Japanese Government cannot prevent its nationals from being excluded everywhere but from Brazil. Immigration restrictions on Japanese are much more severe than on Jews. All the might and power of Japan have been unable to mitigate the dislike and fear with which other nations view Japanese intrusion.

It is obvious that, unless anti-Semitism is tackled at its roots, Zionism, and the success of the Jews in Palestine, will do nothing to prevent anti-Jewish feeling in other countries.

ZIONISM

A spiritual centre might serve if anti-Semitism were due to a lack of spirituality in Jews. A Zionist State would be impotent in the face of such a convulsion as the German outburst. "A spiritual centre," wrote Zangwill some time ago, "round which the Jews of the Diaspora are to group as a political nationality, which nationality, however, is to be in no contradiction with their local nationality as Englishmen, Frenchmen, or Germans, is a conception which goes dangerously near nonsense, and nonsensically near danger."

As to Zionism acting as a force against assimilatory disintegration of Jews, it has been abundantly shown that the only factors which negative the forces of assimilation are those of persecution and anti-Semitism, allied to the length of time which assimilation requires. The whole tendency of Jewish history has been towards assimilation where and when conditions have been favourable. Even the growth of the Zionist ideal has been due to the exacerbation of anti-Semitic feeling. It stands to reason, then, that the increase or retardation of assimilation depends to a large extent on what happens in the countries of the Dispersion, rather than upon what occurs in Palestine.

Thus Dr. Weizmann writes: "That the homogeneous Jewish group has persisted under such conditions is little short of wonderful. It is only to be explained by a quite exceptionally strong national instinct" (What is Zionism?). Yet a little later he writes: "One effect of political and social emancipation on the Jews of the West has been to break up their solidarity. They have gained the right to participate in the lives of modern nations, not as a national or sub-national group, but as individuals. . . . The culture and aspirations of the State in which he lives play an ever-growing part in the inner life of the individual Jew, and restrict more and more the sphere of activities in which his Jewishness expresses itself. And, on the other hand, the conception of what it means to be a Jew becomes more and more vague and uncertain for lack of a concrete embodiment. . . . Hence the natural progress of the emancipated Jew is through assimilation to absorption in his environment." But what has become of the "exceptionally strong national instinct"?

ZIONISM

As the political and economic status of the Jew in Palestine becomes enhanced, and when sufficient momentum has been given to the country by the charitable impetus of years, a situation will develop when the Jews outside Palestine will no longer be required to render aid. Palestine must, as time goes on, become less and less dependent on the efforts of Jews in America, South Africa, Poland, and England. When that time comes, there will inevitably be a loosening of the ties which bind the land of Israel to Jews elsewhere. It is true that at present Hebrew schools, Jewish cultural societies, and Jewish communal work are binding factors among Jews outside Palestine. Largely these enthusiasms are whipped up at frequent intervals by visits from distinguished Zionists on a collecting campaign. In between, interest languishes. The German débâcle has intensified these manifestations of national differentiation. And, if anti-Semitism grows in Europe, there is no doubt at all that the will to Jewishness will become accentuated.

ZIONISM

Let us assume that it does—that the argument as to the binding force of Zionism is sound. We shall have a situation where the Jewish minorities in each country outside Palestine will build for themselves invisible ghetto walls, behind which they will accentuate their Jewishness, their traditions, their customs, their languages, their schools, and their religious institutions. It is to be assumed that they will, in addition, require the ruling classes of the countries in which they dwell to grant them civic equality and to yield to them those rights and privileges which are freely granted to other citizens. There is absolutely no reason why this should be regarded as an outrageous demand. In fact, no really civilised country should deny its national minorities complete religious and secular freedom. Only the stark fact remains that not even in civilised countries is this likely to be regarded as a reasonable request. Not till economic conditions in a country permit the toleration of alien minorities will there be an opportunity for such minorities to obtain equal consideration without the slightest discrimination, whilst retaining the right to preserve their identity and to emphasise their national integrity. Elsewhere I shall show that there never can be absolute freedom for national minorities in a country comprising classes with conflicting interests, and there never has been a time in history where as a minority Jews have been able to maintain their separateness without suffering in some way in consequence. Even in England they have had complete freedom for years only at the price of social discrimination. We see the truth of this observation in the complete collapse of the legal provisions inserted into the Treaty of Versailles for the protection of national minorities. Legal pretensions succumb to the logic of reality.

ZIONISM

I have discussed Zionism, assuming, throughout, the existence of an established Jewish State, and ignoring the hesitant policy of the Mandatory Power and dissensions with the Arabs. Both factors must have an important bearing on the attainment of that ideal. A Jewish State cannot exist in vacuo, particularly when such a State is small and powerless. It must be subject to the repercussions of the policy of greater nations. The success of a national policy is bound up with the ultimate fate of nationalism elsewhere. Under the most favourable circumstances such a State must continue to be a pawn in the game of international intrigue. How much more so when it has still to tread the thorny path of the achievement of sovereign independence?

ZIONISM

We are driven to the conclusion that, despite the assertions of Zionists, Palestine can in no way affect the welfare and national well-being of Jews elsewhere. Economic and racial differentiation may continue to intensify race-consciousness in them, but no one will maintain that race-consciousness so engendered can in any way be regarded as dignified, or as resting on a healthy basis.

Zionism cannot be looked upon as a permanent contribution to the solution of the Jewish problem. It will serve as a refuge for some time to come for a minority of Jews, unhappy elsewhere, but it leaves untouched the difficulty of providing security and inner peace for millions in exile.

THINGS—NOT MEN

I HAVE SAID in a previous chapter that the case for anti-Semitism in all its ramifications rests on a belief that a fundamental clash of values separates Jew from Gentile. I indicated that the foundations for this belief must be sought in the social relations that existed between them in the past. The possibility of resolving an age-long struggle can lie only in a proper evaluation of this relationship ; for, if there is a fallacy in this conviction of a barrier, it must be based on a contradiction in the social symbiosis of Jew and Gentile. We must search for factor, or factors, which upset the smooth rhythm in the development of mutual harmony.

One of the most notable characteristics of anti-Semitism is its cyclical character. Jews arrive in a country. They experience no disability. More troop in. Hostility is aroused which grows until it culminates in expulsion, or segregation, and the march is on to another country.

Now, it is obvious that when a cycle of events is repeated many times, in many countries, at periods separated from each other by many years, and going back to the remotest antiquity, that some common denominator must be present. A group manifestation such as this which extends over thousands of years is bound to show variations—local and temporal—but in the main its constant features must rest on a constant factor. It is my thesis that this constant factor is the class-war.

THINGS—NOT MEN

What do we mean by the “class-war”? The words have become so hackneyed, they sound so much a cliché of Hyde Park, that they convey no sense of reality. Nobody can seriously deny that for the vast majority of mankind the pressing problem of all times has been to procure bread for themselves and their dependants, and to safeguard their material existence. The main aim has been economic security. At this juncture someone is sure to interject that other motives have entered into men's desire—his spiritual yearnings, for example, a striving for the Infinite or the contemplation of human destiny. I do not deny this. Nevertheless, the irrefutable fact remains that the primary basic aim is the satisfaction of such mundane requirements as hunger, thirst, and protection from the elements. For most men this has been the mainspring of their lives.

This contention is so trite that we constantly forget its implications. It is so obvious that we persistently ignore it. Yet no social study is founded on reality that does not base itself on the struggle for material welfare. Poverty may be bearable, but economic insecurity, the haunting anxiety of unemployment, and uncertainty as to the future of himself and his dependants, not only robs a man of dignity, but destroys his sense of values. I cannot lay sufficient emphasis on this cardinal point. There have been many exceptional men and women who have ignored material considerations and have scorned to base their lives upon them, but mankind in the mass has been ruled by motives which, in the last analysis, are bound up with the primitive struggle for existence.

THINGS—NOT MEN

It is quite true that under special circumstances material considerations may be ignored for varying periods. I have stated elsewhere that patriotic emotion may blind a whole people to their own interests. But even here there is a breaking-point. Patriotism is not proof, for example, against an economic blockade. Poverty and starvation, the results of such a blockade, swept the German Emperor away and forced his generals to sue for peace. Religious beliefs, too, may act as a damper on revolutionary attempts to upset a social order, but not for long. Religion, patriotism, moral indignation, all succumb eventually to the inexorable logic of material hardship.

THINGS—NOT MEN

In the course of history, man's struggle with his surroundings and the resulting social order has always presented the picture of a group in each community which has succeeded in achieving economic security, and a larger group dependent on it for its livelihood. When, for one reason or another, the first group has been unable to provide the second with at least the minimum necessary for existence, there have followed social upheavals and attempts to overthrow the existing state of things. The purpose has not always been achieved successfully. The issues have not always been clear-cut. But the fundamental divergence of interest, based on the changing nature of human needs, is quiescent in periods of peace and relative stability, and boils over only when starvation and unemployment serve to emphasise the anomalies of poverty and wealth. This, in essence, is what is meant when we talk of the class-war. And, if history were not generally taught as aimlessly as it is, it would not be necessary for me to repeat what is merely platitudinous.

The gravest factor in economic unrest is the contrast between poverty and wealth. It is possible to envisage a community resigned to poverty and privation if all its members suffer equally. The struggle that exists will be mainly a struggle against the forces of Nature. The very real hardship endured by the Russians in the consummation of their Five-Year Plan was unaccompanied by any signs of mass dissatisfaction. Such violence as showed itself was directed against the kulak class, whose standard of life was higher than that of the masses. The spectacle of a minority living in comfort while the rest starve sooner or later leads to riots and revolution. You may bull-dose the starving by an appeal to their patriotism or the blessings of ultimate reward, and for a time you will be successful.

THINGS—NOT MEN

But—and this is a very important but—patience is liable to be strained very much sooner where the contrasting class is alien. A German worker, resigned to his poverty and wretchedness, may not be aroused by the sight of his well-fed employer driving past in an expensive limousine ; but let the car be filled with a hook-nosed Semitic family and his indignation will know no bounds. It is unlikely that he will say : “ An economic system which allows this man so much and me so little is evil, and must be destroyed.” He is much more likely to join the nearest Storm-Troop detachment. And what is true for the worker applies with equal force to the petty trader and to the man with a profession.

Anti-Semitism is a by-product of the class-war. Here in a nutshell is the explanation of a social phenomenon which has been troubling the world for thousands of years. If this appears to be an over-simplification of the matter, we may console ourselves with the reflection that there are few social problems which do not rest on the same foundation.

THINGS—NOT MEN

Out of this central factor grow all the excrescences which distinguish anti-Semitism. Inarticulate resentment against an inadequate social system is deflected to an extraneous object. Resentment so roused finds its rational justification in denunciations of the Jews' honesty, of his morals, of his unfair competition, and, in the last resort, of his physical appearance.

If any, reading this, imagine my thesis is that the Jews are a blameless, misunderstood, and impeccable race, and that the sins of omission and commission of which they are accused exist purely in the imagination of their enemies, they will have misread me. I have tried throughout this book to emphasise that we are what we are largely as a result of our environment. Nobody but a Nazi numskull denies this. You may "condition" a race as Pavlov "conditions" his dogs. And if by persecution and obloquy, by hatred and contempt, by exclusion and restrictions, you force the Jew into habits, customs, and economic avenues which are the natural corollary of such treatment, you will very probably produce a people varying mentally, morally, and physically from your own standards.

THINGS—NOT MEN

It is one of the difficulties which Jews, in studying the forces which make for anti-Semitism, rarely face. They are too apt to regard world history as a sequence of events in which they feature as the principals and the rest as supers. Their judgment of an event is coloured by its influence on Jewish history. In doing so they make a mistake which is common to all races. And so we rarely find Jewish writers and historians surveying the Jewish struggle for emancipation and self-expression as a phase in the general struggle of mankind to free itself from poverty, cruelty, and oppression.

Any attempt to discuss the Jewish question which is not based on a study of the social contacts of Jew and Gentile is bound to lead to futilities. A case in point is to be found in a recently published book, The Jew at Bay, which purports to be an analysis of the problem. I mention it here because it is a fair indication of the intellectual measure of such books. It contains a number of unoriginal generalisations. The Jew is this and the Jew is that. He is never an engine-driver. He never commands a battleship. He eats too much. He overdresses. An inventory of his virtues and his vices is drawn, and when it is all done we are as wise as when we began. There is, of course, the usual criticism of the Polish Jew. How many thousands of times are we told : “ We have no objection to decent Jews ; it is the ‘ foreign ’ Jew, the Polish Jew, of whom we would like to be rid ” ? Nothing illustrates so clearly as this ancient tag the mental confusion into which one is thrown by a superficial examination of the case. Polish Jews more than any other Jews form the Jewish proletarian reservoir. They are the product of squalid conditions which have operated for centuries. They are the victims of unsettled political status and economic subjection characteristic of the country in which they dwelt. To expect dignity, culture, and emotional repose from them is as reasonable as to demand it from the slum-dwellers of any big city in the world. The actual fact is that the children of these Polish and Lithuanian Jews, transplanted to better surroundings, are the selfsame “ decent Jew ” against whom, presumably, there is no feeling of prejudice.

The depressing fact remains that it is the rarest thing to find the problem discussed intelligently. From the crazed anti-Semite, who rationalises his hate in a thousand tortuous ways, to the good-hearted, muddled liberal who hates cruelty and unkindness, but whitewashes the asinine crudities of a Hitler by regarding them as a reaction against the "bad sort of Jew"—from the one extreme to the other it is impossible to obtain a rational analysis of a situation which affects the peace and happiness of 16 million people. Partly, of course, this is due to a vast ignorance of the issues involved, but mainly this is so because the tribulations of Jews affect their neighbours as little as the news of a Chinese famine, or an earthquake in Japan. They are too engrossed in their own troubles to shoulder those of people who, after all, are strangers to them. Nevertheless, as I shall endeavour to show, the troubles of the Jews are of immense import to the Gentile world. Fourier, years ago, declared that in any given society the degree of woman's emancipation is the natural measure of the general emancipation. He might with equal justice have said the same of the degree of Jewish emancipation.

"The question of the capacity of the Jews for emancipation," wrote Karl Marx (Selected Essays : "The Jewish Question"), "is from our standpoint transformed into the question : What particular social element has to be overcome in order to abolish Judaism? For the capacity for emancipation of the modern Jew is the relation of Judaism to the emancipation of the modern world. This relation is necessarily disclosed by the special position of Judaism in the modern subjugated world.

“ Let us consider the real worldly Jews, not the Sabbath Jews. We will not look for the secret of the Jew in his religion, but we will look for the secret of religion in the real Jew. What is the secular basis of Judaism ? Practical needs, egotism. What is the secular cult of the Jew ? Huckstering. What is his secular God ? Money.

“ Very well. Emancipation from huckstering and from money, and, therefore, from real Judaism, would be the self-emancipation of our epoch.

“ An organisation of society which would abolish the fundamental conditions of huckstering, and, therefore the possibility of huckstering, would render the Jew impossible. His religious consciousness would dissolve like a mist in the real vital air of society.”

Karl Marx was born a Jew. It is quite certain that throughout his life he gave little thought to what is known as the Jewish question. (How he would have writhed if he had been told that the gospel of Marxism was contaminated by the Jewish spirit !) To him the Jews were an unpleasant race, “ hucksters and usurers,” and their struggle an unimportant facet of life. Yet he could have found no better proof of the validity of historical materialism than in the study of the problem of the Jew. So closely does anti-Semitism correspond to economic crises that it is possible to study the economic vicissitudes of a country by studying the history of its Jews. The Jew is the index of class unrest. He is the thermometer of the body politic. An exacerbation of anti-Semitism in a country indicates that all is not well as surely as does a rise of temperature in an ailing patient.

I have said that in the class-struggle lies the clue to the constant factor in anti-Judaism. I must proceed now to show in which way it operates. It is fairly obvious that the general tendency for two races living side by side is to merge. A casual perusal of Jewish history reveals that such tendencies have been present from the beginning. There has never been a period during which assimilation has not taken place. If we think for a moment of the process of assimilation as an isolated phenomenon, a process proceeding in vacuo, divorced from all other considerations, we perceive at once that, left to itself, it must end in complete blending, for as it advances it creates more and more favourable conditions for its continuance. It must gather momentum, for each individual step towards assimilation must make subsequent stages easier. In other words, if the process is retarded it cannot be merely a question of tempo. Some extraneous factor must be acting to negative it. I shall show in another chapter that outbreaks of violent anti-Semitism have been synchronous with violent stages of the class-war ; that what I have referred to as the rhythmicity of anti-Semitism corresponds to the rhythmicity of the class-war, and that the constant factor lies in this and in nothing else.

THINGS—NOT MEN

I ought to anticipate at this stage the criticism to which I feel certain I shall be subjected by those who imagine that a general principle collapses because it does not agree with some apparent deviation. It is quite obvious that the reciprocal forces of action and reaction play an important part in this, as in every other problem. If you begin with a mass pogrom against Jews, in which the most violent things are done and the wildest accusations made, it is unreasonable to expect either of the participators to forget everything once the fight is over. Arising out of the general motivating force, a host of minor, and, ætiologically speaking, unimportant impulses remain. To come down to particulars : one may dislike Jews because they killed Christ, another because he considers them crooks, and yet another because he cherishes an æsthetic antipathy towards them. None of these side-issues invalidate the general law, for the translation of a dislike of an individual into that of a whole group cannot have its origin except in a group reason. "Cause and effect are eternally changing places," wrote Engels, "so that what is effect here and now will be cause there and then, and vice-versa." It is true that many of the facets of anti-Semitism are not equally illuminated by the economic motive. They have to be viewed from all angles to be seen in true perspective.

But how else can we explain the emergence of anti-Semitic movements in countries such as England, and some of the Dominions, where every Jew had thought the ghost of Jew-hatred laid? Is it coincidence that a universal slump endangering the economic security of millions exists at the same time? I have pointed out that class antagonism finds its clearest expression in times of economic depression, when the stability of political institutions is strained to its utmost. It is a verifiable fact that it is precisely during such periods that popular movements against Jews reach their zenith.

The magnitude of the world crisis may be gauged by the emergence of anti-Semitic movements in all countries.

Germany, the cockpit of the class-war, has inevitably become the scene of the most violent anti-Jewish orgies, just as the death-struggle of feudalism in pre-war Poland and Russia was accompanied by outrageous treatment of their Jews.

Certain qualifying statements must be made. When Fascism came to Italy there was some attempt at an anti-Semitic movement, but on the whole the Italian eruption has been noticeably free from Jew-baiting. At first sight this would seem to be a contradiction of our theory. If we remember, however, that there are only 30,000 Jews in Italy among a population of 40 million Italians, and that there is hardly a Jewish family in Italy which cannot claim Gentile relations, the reason for the apparent contradiction becomes obvious.

Poland, on the other hand, with a large proportion of unassimilated Jews, might have been expected to show a greater reaction than it has. But it is difficult to see how, short of a revival of pogroms, it would be possible for any depression to worsen the lot of the Polish Jew. Even Nazi Germany has stopped short of official pogroms. The world has changed, in spite of what is sometimes said, and it is more expedient for a modern State to transform a national minority into helots than to wipe it out by pogroms. The Polish situation however, has revealed one pleasing spectacle : a virulently anti-Semitic country being forced to reproach another for its ill treatment of Jews because they happen to be Polish nationals.

THINGS—NOT MEN

In general, then, the situation in which Jews find themselves to-day bears out the contention that the curves of anti-Semitism and economic conflict approximate each other. Surveying the modern scene, it is obvious that any development of harmony which might have been taking place between Jew and Gentile is bound to be retarded by the contemporary phase of the class-war. Any consciousness of a gulf between them is certain to be intensified.

An examination of the social relations between Jew and Gentile brings us to the conclusion that the idea of the two, being irrevocably separate from one another, depends for its growth and perpetuation on periodic crises arising in the transformation of the economic structure of the world. It is quite obvious that this notion is not startlingly new. Most superficial observers have been content before now to put anti-Semitism down to what is called "economic jealousy." But this is usually said without any clear idea of its implications. The argument is used mainly in the sense that the supposed wealth of all Jews is resented. There is never any suggestion as to why it is resented, and why hostility should react equally on Jews without money. The popular idea that every Jewish pedlar ends his days in Park Lane is clearly absurd.

The feeling that the Jew is the antithesis of the Gentile, whether it is expressed by Jews in their conception of themselves as God's "Chosen Race" or by Gentiles in regarding God's choice as very odd, is an ideological reflection of the material conditions regulating the lives of both. Elsewhere I have shown that ideological reflections persist very often long after the material conditions which produced them have altered. And we have an example of this in the case we are discussing. The material conditions governing the symbiosis of Jew and Gentile have altered. The isolation of the ghetto period has given way to a state of affairs in which almost everywhere most economic avenues are available as occupations to both groups. Regarded as a dialectic process, modern anti-Semitism differs from that of the dark ages only in the contradiction of an altered material basis, and an unaltered ideological superstructure.

THINGS—NOT MEN

This is why no analysis of anti-Semitism to-day can rest on the hypothesis that the Jew is constitutionally and inherently a different individual, with a different outlook on life, and a different code of morals. For it is quite certain that there are no national types. There are class types, and the Jew is the product of class grouping to-day, just as is the Gentile. The habit of generalising about the qualities of a race is so ingrained in most of us that it is almost impossible for the average man to realise that there are many Irishmen who do not answer to the stage or literary description of Irishmen, just as there are many Jews who do not resemble the text-book Jew. The most difficult thing to get into the thick head of the man in the street is that primary qualities, such as honesty, candour, truthfulness, cleanliness, and virtuous behaviour, are not absorbed in some sort of osmotic manner from the atmosphere of the country in which one happens to be born, but largely from the human contacts and material environment in which one dwells. In practice we recognise this. We do not think of an Indian prince as a coolie, and we perceive that a Chinese diplomat has more in common with an English Foreign Office representative than with a Chinese laundryman. To assume a certain constancy in the Jewish character is to be oblivious to the fact that there are class differentiations among Jews as among other races. To generalise about the Jewish mind is to suppose that Einstein's attitude to life is similar to that of an American-Jewish talkie magnate.

THINGS—NOT MEN

It is because of this that the stock arguments of the anti-Semite amount to nonsense. How is it possible to reconcile the statement that all Jews are Communists with the fact that the finance capitalist and the petty bourgeois have full representation among them? And that the main grievance of German Jews against Hitler is that he has not allowed them to join the National Socialist Party? The converse of the statement that Jews are Communists—Communists are Jews—is just as patently absurd. For, in this case, the animus is not so much against Jews as against Communism. To discredit Communism the epithet Jewish is applied to it, again with the object of emphasising it as a theory of life which is alien to the rest of European civilisation. If Communism made its appeal solely to Jews, upholders of the capitalist régime might sleep soundly.

THINGS—NOT MEN

We shall get no further if we assume, with Hitler, that the Jew does not react to class stimuli in the same way as the Gentile. Under the stress of national difficulties Jews may respond temporarily as a corporate body, but to suggest that there is always a unity of purpose and design among them is merely to give way to the kind of stupidity which pictures every Chinaman as a member of a secret society, pledged to the overthrow of white domination—a nightmarish view, fed on a surfeit of cheap novels and cheaper films.

If we could picture the Jews remaining in undisturbed possession of their original home throughout the vicissitudes of the last twenty centuries, if that country had evolved into the modern national State, it is reasonable to assume that there would exist no anti-Semitism as we know it to-day. The dispersion of so many members of one race, divorced from their national home, has no parallel in history. This is why the problem of the Jew is essentially the problem of the stranger to the herd. It is his apparent differentiation from the herd which makes him the mirror of the troubles of the herd.

THINGS—NOT MEN

Constant contact with strange cultures makes Jews conspicuous wherever they go. They are persecuted in Poland and they flock to America, carrying with them the habits and customs of the Polish ghettos. They take with them their accents, their wretched poverty, and an immense desire to better their circumstances. They swarm into the big cities, since they have been debarred from the land for centuries. When their numbers are sufficiently large to present a marked contrast in their ways and customs to those of hundred-per-cent Americans, they give rise to a restrained anti-Semitism, which at crucial periods may flare up into unbridled persecution.

It has been a truism for hundreds of years that no country can put up with more than a small percentage of Jews, and, in seeking for a reason for something which at first sight appears to be a mystery, it becomes clear that if 100,000 proletarian Americans were transplanted over a period of twenty years to a few big towns in Poland, there would undoubtedly be a similar reaction against them. It is not because they are Jews that no country can put up with more than one or two per cent of them, but because they are regarded as strangers. And the reason is that up to now there has been only one country which has so moulded its economic life that it can accommodate strangers. If Nature abhors a vacuum, mankind almost universally abhors a stranger.

THINGS—NOT MEN

The life history of a mass movement against Jews is easily reconstructed. It can be built up step by step. There are no marked differences in essential features between its characteristics in the Middle Ages and in modern times. First there is a period of economic stress ; harvests fail, a pestilence devastates the countryside, or a war leaves in its train poverty and unemployment. Antagonism between the ruling classes and the starving masses develops. It is noticed that a number of Jews appear to be unaffected by the prevailing hard times. In the back street the cry arises : “ We are being exploited for the benefit of the Jews.” The movement gains momentum. Old stories are retold. Someone rediscovers the “ Protocols of Zion,” or its more ancient equivalent, the “ blood ritual people whose hospitality he abuses. Does this absolve the wretchedly poor, sweated Jewish labourers in Polish and Lithuanian ghettos? Jews form an uncouth swarming mass of sweated labour, lowering the standard of wages and swindling their way to success through unfair competition, corruption, and shady commercial transactions. Does this protect the Jewish scientist, littérateur, artist, or musician from being deprived of his livelihood? The Jew is a Communist, aiding and abetting revolution. Does this make the Jewish capitalist popular?

THINGS—NOT MEN

Make your way through the whole gamut of accusation and counter-accusation. Is there any light shed on the problem? But do away with the sanctions of private property and anti-Semitism disappears like morning mist before the sun. What clearer proof do we need? What more remains to be said?

THE COCKPIT

NO STUDY OF ANTI-SEMITISM is complete which ignores the reaction against the Jew in Germany. Indeed, it is the Nazi treatment of the Jewish minority in Germany which has brought the Jewish question into the lime-light once again, and has caused Governments in most other countries to revise their attitude to the Jew and to Jewish immigration.

A great deal of the discussion as to the whys and wherefores of German anti-Semitism has centred round a fruitless examination of German mentality. We are told that the German prefers uniformity, loves authority, discipline, and regimentation, and has no natural affinity for these democratic institutions which are supposed to be the heritage of the Anglo-Saxon and French peoples. Many Jews, not unreasonably, in the teeth of the hurricane of hate and poisonous propaganda against them, which the Nazis have loosed over the world, believe today that the majority of Germans remain barbarians, uncivilised and incapable of tolerating deviations from their norm.

All this, of course, is nonsense. To generalise about Germans is as unprofitable as it is to generalise about Jews. There is nothing inherent in the physical and mental make-up of the German which renders him incapable of treating a Jew fairly. We shall have to look elsewhere for an explanation of the loathing and hatred of the Jew which has shaken Germany like some elemental fury.

THE COCKPIT

We have to remember that violent anti-Semitism is no new thing in Germany—that, in point of fact, Germany was the first modern State to discriminate against Jews and to exhibit political parties with anti-Semitism as the main plank in their political programme. I exclude Russia and the Balkan countries, for it was only the Great War which finally shattered absolutism in these States. The French Revolution and the Napoleonic era, which dealt the death-blow to feudalism in Germany and Austria, resulted, as a side-issue, in the political emancipation of the Jew. And in Germany the transition stages of the breakdown of feudalism, its replacement by bourgeois capitalism, and its transformation into monopoly capitalism and imperialism, were telescoped into a period of, at most, about eighty or ninety years—little more than a lifetime of one generation. As a corollary to these social fluctuations the cult of nationalism, the unfailing accompaniment of the bourgeois State, developed with equal rapidity.

THE COCKPIT

The growth of an industrial and financial oligarchy ruling over a middle class, and an agricultural and industrial proletariat replacing the feudal structure, was no sooner completed than it was subjected to the corroding influence of an imperialist war and the subsequent emergence of inevitable class conflicts. Germany and, to a lesser extent, Austria were the only modern European countries with large Jewish populations which had to face these economic upheavals. Both France and England had passed through these phases—England more slowly than France—but neither of them was presented with the problem of an alien minority in its midst claiming equal privileges and rights of citizenship in such numbers as in Germany or Austria.

The historical inevitability of the emergence of anti-Semitism in Germany and Austria was preordained. The character of the Germans is a side-issue, and has no relevance to the facts. Englishmen and Frenchmen faced with such a situation would have reacted similarly, as, in point of fact, they show signs of doing. The point must be reiterated. The political and economic changes in Germany, almost kaleidoscopic in nature, occurred in a country which contained a comparatively large Jewish population concentrated mainly in the few large towns which set the political pace. These changes benefited the Jew greatly. From a state of affairs where he was herded in ghettos, kept out of guilds, and forbidden to own land, he emerged half blinded into the sun of economic and political freedom. As entrepreneur, financier, and free-lance trader he found the bourgeois State eminently suited to his financial and commercial training. It was not long before the contrast of a hitherto despised caste rising to heights of unexampled prosperity and influence brought its inevitable sequel. Already, in 1870, we see the emergence of an anti-Semitic party, opposed to "Jewish domination."

THE COCKPIT

This fear of "alien domination," of the advancement of the stranger, is a constant feature in anti-Semitism. I have shown it to be a natural accompaniment of the system of private property, and Germany offers a remarkable confirmation of this view. The Jewish scapegoat, or "whipping-boy," so beloved of liberal commentators, has its origin in the fact that it is much easier to recognise an exploiter when he is a stranger than when he is of your own kith and kin.

The irruption of the ghetto Jew into German life was further complicated by the race-fantasies of Houston Chamberlain and Richard Wagner, which were partly a product of the awakening nationalist consciousness in Germany. This awakening to the consciousness of nationalism is something which nationalists strongly desire in their own people and resent equally strongly in others. To observe an ardent nationalist dissecting calmly the nationalist aspirations of a rival group is one of the pleasantest spectacles still left for intelligent people. But this by the way. Having opened the gates to the Jew in his ghetto cell, the emancipated European was surprised to find stumbling out, not a Jew emancipated and modern, but a creature showing largely the effects of his isolation—emotional, suspicious, with a language of his own, a literature, traditions, customs, food, clothes, and physical appearance acquired as a result of centuries of contempt and persecution and exclusion. In other words, a survival from the Middle Ages faced the gaoler when the prisoner emerged. When, on top of his outlandish strangeness, he began to take an active part in the growth of the country, it was not long before it was realised that one could make too much of a fetish of freedom and liberalism.

THE COCKPIT

Once popular feeling has been roused and all the potentialities appear for using anti-Semitism as a pawn in the political game, it would be asking too much to expect politicians not to exploit it. There is no clearer example of this than in the attitude of Sir Oswald Mosley and his group of Blackshirts.¹ It is quite obvious that, left to himself, Sir Oswald Mosley is no anti-Semite, and he has reiterated time and again that his faction of Fascists is in no way anti-Jewish. Gradually, however, the clamour of his own supporters, and the realisation of the value of anti-Semitism as an aid to power, is forcing itself to the front. And, beginning with his threat to "alien finance" in the City, we may confidently expect anti-Semitism to be added to his political programme. The astute Bismarck did not hesitate to utilise it when opportunism demanded it; and no party politician, eager for power, can afford to ignore it for long. Frequently the movement is from below, from the illiterates and unwashed, but just as frequently the universities, presumably the stronghold of culture and tolerance, are the source of political agitation. This latter fact may occasion some surprise to those who are not acquainted with university tradition and the average personnel of universities. But to those who realise the ignorance of the social sciences, and the low standard of general knowledge which prevails at most modern universities, it will come as no new thing. Higher education is not proof against the reality of competition from Jews in the field of medicine, law, science, and the arts. Those observers who display amazement that the Germans have rid themselves of distinguished men in all branches of learning, as well as of Jews who "dominate" commerce, are blind to the fact that the competitive struggle affects not only the economics of petty trading, but that of the peddling of bourgeois culture. Time and again we have to emphasise that technical perfection in science or the arts is no criterion of broad-minded tolerance, nor can it provide the cachet of authority to social behaviour or social pronouncements. Indeed, when a professor of physics, or a lecturer in economics, issues an authoritative statement on something which is outside the sphere of his subject, it is usually time to reach for the salt-cellar.

¹ This prediction has now been abundantly vindicated. Refer, e.g., to Mosley's speech at the Albert Hall on Sunday, October 28th, 1934.

THE COCKPIT

THE COCKPIT

There is no point in repeating the history of the anti-Semitic movement in Germany of the late nineteenth century. The crash of 1873, and the depression which followed and lasted for seven or eight years, was succeeded by several boom periods. These boom periods gave the quietus to the more virulent political movements. But it is important to recognise that the eddies of such popular revulsions of feeling persist for a long time after the original storm has spent itself. It is largely thus that anti-Semitism perpetuates itself. The curve of anti-Semitism may drop, but the momentum given it is sufficient to carry it through a period of comparative peace. If the rulers of Germany were to experience a change of heart tomorrow, and to return the Jews their privileges and rights, it would still take years for the bitter memories of the present strife to be erased. The Jews, with recollections of their treatment, would remain suspicious and fearful, and the non-Jews would not be able to forget readily the poisonous lying propaganda instilled into them. And so it has been with all previous anti-Semitic outbursts.

THE COCKPIT

Anti-Jewish feeling, then, has existed beneath the surface in Germany to a much more marked degree than in England or France, though in the case of the latter country the Dreyfus Affair was indication enough of the resentment with which the clericals regarded the encroachment of Jews. But it was the German defeat in the Great War, and the social upheavals consequent upon it, which brought the simmering dislike of the Jew to the boiling-point in that country.

It was only in the soil of a country racked by the miseries of inflation, blockade, and war, where the masses starved and the few exploiters flourished, that the crazy propaganda of the Nazis could take root. With the best will in the world, no sensible, intelligent individual can read Hitler's book, My Struggle, without a feeling of amazement that such colossal ignorance, such malignant stupidity, could ever take hold of a nation which had hitherto been in the vanguard of progress.

THE COCKPIT

Some such feeling of wonderment must be responsible for the activities of the "white-washers." There is no period in history which cannot show a group of writers and thinkers who have been eager to whitewash the evil deeds of usurpers and tyrants. The Nazi accession to power has afforded the usual spectacle of a number of objective spectators who, because they cannot understand the reasons for such intensity of hate, feel that there must be some justification for it. Apart from the muddled leader-writers and literary hacks who by instinct like to keep one foot in each camp, a number of earnest and well-meaning journalists and visitors to Germany see in Hitlerism now something which no intelligent observer saw in the days when the Nazis were an irresponsible rabble.

They maintain that anti-Semitism is merely an incident in the Nazi programme. They accept placidly, as a fait accompli, the Nazi revolution, and do not realise that the central basis of what purports to be the platforms of the National Socialist Party is anti-Semitism. Remove this centre-piece from it and the whole ridiculous façade of race glorification, the entire tomfoolery of a pure German race, falls to the ground. A casual perusal of Hitler's book will show that hatred of the Jew is the philosophic corner-stone of National "Socialism." These whitewashers do not see that if Hitler restored their rights to the Jews he would betray himself to the German nation as an impostor. They are blind to the fact that, even if they wanted to do so, Goering, Goebbels, and the rest do not dare to treat the Jews with elementary justice, for if they did they would be conceding the main point in the programme that gave them power.

THE COCKPIT

It is interesting to contrast the anxiety of the respectable newspapers of the world to search for signs of constructive statesmanship among the leaders of the Nazi movement with their prophecies some years ago of the decay of the party because of unintelligent leadership. Let Hitler mouth some of the well-worn tags of diplomacy, such as that "Germany loves her neighbours and desires peace—but peace with security," and they heave a sigh of relief and murmur that, after all, Hitler is learning restraint and wisdom. How little restraint and wisdom such minds as his are able to absorb they will soon learn to their cost.

The Nazi treatment of German Jews has ceased to be front-page news. The Jewish communities in other countries are engaged in licking the wounds of their brothers in distress, even if the attitude they assume is rather like that of a mother who scolds an injured child who has disobeyed her. (There is something tragic in the analogy between German Jewry and a venturesome child, for, as everyone knows, that community has gone furthest along the path to assimilation.) But if the Press of the world has forgotten their plight, and other countries turn a deaf ear to their protests, this does not mean that conditions have changed appreciably. The return to helotry is being quietly and systematically carried out.

THE COCKPIT

It is obvious that neither the elimination of the Jew from the German picture nor even the extermination of all German Jews will solve the economic problem and class conflicts of the German State. When the German masses awake, disillusioned, from their dream to find that the new régime is unable to give them that security and freedom which Nazidom has promised them, when they realise that the new State is merely another reflection of the power of the great industrialists and bankers to rule their lives, then will come the real trial of strength. It will be a struggle in which it will not be possible to trail the red herring of Jewish domination across their path. Long before that happens it is possible that their rulers will have made the political gambler's last throw—war. It is not for nothing that Goering says : “ The tramp of a single disciplined formation is worth more than the choicest speech in Parliament, and the march-step of a formation has now become the march-step of a nation. When grave times come again—and they will come—Potsdam must form an iron backbone.”

THE COCKPIT

What has happened in Germany is a clear illustration of my general thesis. A glance at the official literature issued for foreign consumption by the Nazi propagandists shows that they regard their case against the Jews as amply proved when they produce statistics which show Jews predominating in commerce, the arts, and the professions out of all proportion to their numbers in the general population. This complaint of Jewish domination is one that is common to all ages, and yet it is explicable only on the assumption of an underlying conception of the Jew as a stranger.

The assimilation urge which was a characteristic feature of the life of German Jewry was not proof against the rapid transformation in the social and political structure of Germany.

In the next chapter I shall endeavour to show that what is true in Germany to-day has been equally true of Jews in all their wanderings of the past.

“THE TRAGIC CYCLE”

SOME YEARS after the war, Mr. Hilaire Belloc wrote a book on the Jews in which he propounded a solution to the Jewish problem. Since Mr. Belloc's social insight is such that he could envisage the Russian Revolution as a Jewish plot to transform Russian society as revenge for the persecution which the race had endured, it is perhaps unreasonable to expect from him any clear analysis of what really constitutes the Jewish problem. Much of what is logical in his book is vitiated by this species of medieval obsession.

In one of his lucid moments he talks of Jewish persecution as a “series of cycles invariably following the same step. The Jew comes to an alien society at first in small numbers. He thrives. His presence is not resented. He is rather treated as a friend. Whether from mere contrast in type—what I have called friction—or from some apparent divergence between his objects and those of his hosts, or through his increasing numbers, he creates (or discovers) a growing animosity. He resents it. He opposes his hosts. They call themselves masters in their own house. The Jew resists their claim. It comes to violence. It is always the same miserable sequence. First the welcome ; then the growing half-conscious ill-ease ; next the culmination in acute ill-ease ; lastly catastrophe and disaster ; insult, persecution, even massacre ; the exiles flying from the place of persecution into a new district where the Jew is hardly known ; where the problem has never existed or has been forgotten. He meets again with the largest hospitality. There follows here also, after a period of amicable interfusion, a growing half-conscious ill-ease, which next becomes acute and leads to new explosions and so on in a fatal round.”

“THE TRAGIC CYCLE”

It is this “tragic cycle,” as he calls it, which eludes and baffles most observers. There is an easy tendency to give it a mystical explanation, amongst Jews and non-Jews alike. Let us endeavour to place this puzzle in its correct historical perspective. Let us compare this struggle of an alien people for existence among hostile forces with the simultaneous struggle for the emergence of a new social order, in which the world could provide peace and security to all its creatures instead of to a select few ; because it is against this background that the history of the Jews must be studied. That is where it belongs, and only in that framework does the picture take on coherence. The destiny of Israel has been shaped by the material conditions under which it existed, and by no mystical force. It is a man-made problem, with a man-made solution.

“ THE TRAGIC CYCLE ”

It is not possible here to recapitulate the entire history of the Jews. I am concerned with an attempt to show that their history, if studied in the light of historical materialism, will furnish us with an answer to two questions which are far and away the most important facing the serious student. The first is : How is it that the Jews have survived almost miraculously as a group whilst powerful empires, which overshadowed their tiny little State, collapsed and disappeared ? Does the materialistic conception of history explain their persistence ? Once we deny that it does, we are left with the hypothesis that some divine mission, some mystic purpose, some deathless instinct for national survival, exists in the Jew, and must conclude accordingly, with most other writers, that the whole affair is a manifestation of the miraculous, and leave it at that. The second question to be answered is : Why were the Jews persecuted throughout history ? I have given some indication of why they are persecuted in modern time. I have said that in the history of class struggles, of an evolving order of society, the Jew as the stranger is the first to suffer ; though frequently enough—and more so in modern times—the Jew has been no stranger, but an active participant in the struggle for social justice. Throughout his chequered history the same factor in varying shape and guise has operated.

“THE TRAGIC CYCLE”

The first question as to a materialistic interpretation of their survival is readily answered. We have to remember one outstanding feature in the history of the Jews. From almost the beginning of their recorded history they were widely dispersed. Long before the first destruction of the Temple there were flourishing Jewish communities in many parts of Pharaoh's dominion. After the destruction of Judah by Babylon there were large communities in Babylon and Egypt ; and the post-exile period saw a vast infiltration by the Jews into all the cities of the Hellenistic world. The five centuries of settlement in Palestine, which ended in the breaking up of the Jewish State by Titus, was a period in which this tendency to seek pastures new developed greatly. Just before the Christian era, Strabo wrote that the Jews had penetrated into every State, and that it was difficult to find a single place in the world where they had not been received. And he adds bitterly the immemorial plaint that they had become dominant everywhere. The stresses and strains to which the Palestinian State was peculiarly subject were due to its geographical situation. The little country was a cockpit of clashing empires, the Belgium of the ancient world. And it is not surprising that thousands of Jews should have sought peace in countries further removed from the rivalries of warring kings and generals. Solomon's partnership with Hiram of Tyre in maritime trade brought many Jews into contact with other countries, and the lure of trade sent many more far afield from their homeland. Philo gives the Jewish population in the Nile valley in his time as a quarter of a million. In Mesopotamia and Northern Syria, in every corner of Africa and Asia, there were large communities.

“THE TRAGIC CYCLE”

The dispersion of the Jews, then, dates much further back than A.D. 70. And it is in this dispersion that we see the ultimate reason for their survival, just as in their dispersion to-day we recognise the same forces at work in preserving their identity. It is a fundamental error to assume that this wandering of the Jew was a constant process. Throughout the whole period of history the Jews took root for centuries before they were forced to migrate. The “tragic cycle” revolves very slowly. As a result, one marked feature of Jewish life presents itself to the historian. There might be active persecution of the Jews in one area, but simultaneously another Jewish community far removed would be flourishing.

“ THE TRAGIC CYCLE ”

Two forces tend to disintegrate a people and encourage assimilation. One is persecution, which inevitably drives a section to join the stronger group ; the other is tolerance, which from time immemorial has seduced numberless Jews into the dominant race. But persecution has another well-known effect. It increases resistance and drives stray wanderers back into the fold, and tolerance indirectly does the same. It draws fugitives from a hostile atmosphere to a friendlier one, and they too serve as reminders of the past to the assimilating community, just as the influx of Eastern Jews into Germany served to emphasise the past of German Jewry. Thus, let us say, while the Jews are being persecuted in Spain, national solidarity increases. The ranks close in for greater support. Schisms and faction fights tend to die down, but even in countries like Holland, England, and Turkey, where conditions are favourable and the assimilatory process is proceeding, there is a cry for greater unity. Jewish charitable organisations and collectors serve to remind the favourably placed communities that at any time the same thing might happen to them. Fearful of similar events, they are drawn together. Can anyone doubt that the same thing which is happening now occurred years ago ? Failure of assimilation in Germany is a warning to Jews throughout the world. That very exclusiveness which the non-Jew resents is the inevitable result of the Jew's desire not to be exclusive. The Jew has survived because conditions have conspired to make him survive. In the long view, he has survived because of geography and economics.

“THE TRAGIC CYCLE”

The Jewish State might have been swallowed up peacefully by Hellenistic culture two centuries B.C. had not the régime of Antiochus Epiphanes created social conditions which inevitably led to a revolt against the priestly robbers, whose tax demands kept the peasantry in a state of simmering rebellion. The Maccabean uprising was as much an expression of social discontent as a protest against alien domination. The collapse of the Maccabean State, which followed on this successful rebellion, was inevitable because of the fundamental instability of its social structure. The Pharisees, and to a much greater extent the Essenes, representing the middle classes and the peasantry, were in constant conflict with the Sadducees till finally these struggles, culminating in civil war, left Palestine an easy prey to Rome. With the destruction of Jerusalem and the Temple for the second and last time the real history of the Dispersion begins.

But now there began to emerge a new factor which, in the course of time, was to emphasise the Jew more and more as the stranger and outcast. Christianity in its inception, as has been reiterated time and again, was a religion of the poor based on equality, not only in the sight of God, but in material things. Every reliable commentator on the early Christians records that they led a life completely divorced from the life of the people around them, and that their worldly possessions were shared alike. “And all that believed were together and had all things common ; and sold their possessions and goods, and parted them to all, according as every man had need ” (Acts of the Apostles ii. 44, 45). “And the multitude of them that believed were of one heart and soul : and not one of them said that aught of the things which he possessed was his own ; but they had all things common ” (Acts iv. 32).

“THE TRAGIC CYCLE”

It is not surprising that the dominant pagan and Jewish religions, which had by now become the philosophical expressions of the sanctity of private property, should have felt themselves fundamentally opposed to Christianity. The ridicule and contempt which the wealthy classes among Jews and pagans poured upon Christianity were not merely expressions of dislike for a new religious dogma, but of hostility to a social system which threatened the security of riches and possession. Dean Inge heaps scorn upon the suggestion that the early Christians of that period bear any resemblance to modern Communists, because they did not hold revolutionary aims. It is true that the theory of the class-war and the dictatorship of the proletariat dates from a much later period, nor can we blame the early Christians for having failed to see that their mode of life and ideas of social justice could not have been achieved without the seizure of secular power. But it is difficult to understand why the Romans should have attempted to exterminate Christians unless they thought that Christianity endangered the stability of their institutions, for their hostility did not extend to the Jewish religion, which was equally differentiated from their own. The Jews by now had long forgotten the impassioned cries for a new social order uttered by their own prophets, Amos, Hosea, Isaiah, and Jeremiah. It is conceivably this turning of the blind eye to social history that makes the persecution of the Christians so puzzling to Dean Inge. It was only when Paul, the middle-class Pharisee, had moulded Christianity into a religion which left private property undisturbed, that it became a religion which even the rich could safely profess. The practical importance of the rise of Christianity for the Jew lay in the fact that the life of antiquity had bequeathed to future ages one more feature which marked the Jew off from his fellow-creatures. It was to emphasise more realistically the demarcation of the Jew. From then on, the eternal see-saw began for the Jew. Up to the period of the second destruction of the Temple the vicissitudes of the Jewish State were those of any other petty State. Wars, civil wars, internecine struggles—all these were common enough in the history of that period. The trials and tribulations of the Jews were not experienced qua Jews, but as the inhabitants of an opposing State. For them the special tragedy of A.D. 70 lay in the fact that the Jewish State had been destroyed, but not the Jews.

“THE TRAGIC CYCLE”

“ THE TRAGIC CYCLE ”

The world was faced now with the problem of accommodating a homeless people of considerable numbers (estimated at 4,500,000), widely spread, with traditions, customs, language, and literature differing from that of the people amongst whom they dwelt. In essence that is what distinguishes the history of the Jews from all other conquered tribes of antiquity. No other nation, race, or group had to undergo a similar experience. The world was not ripe for the solution which Ezekiel had propounded : “ Ye shall divide the land . . . and it shall come to pass, that ye shall divide it by lot for an inheritance unto you and to the strangers who sojourn among you . . . they shall be unto you as the homeborn among the children of Israel ; they shall have inheritance with you among the tribes of Israel ” (xlvi.

“ THE TRAGIC CYCLE ”

13-22). The Jews had not taken their lesson to heart, and now that the boot was on the other foot they were to find that the “ aliens ” were not disposed to hearken to the prophet.

It would be a profound mistake to read merely the troubles of a dissenting sect into their subsequent history. Nothing could be further from the facts than to regard the anti-Semitism of the Middle Ages as fundamentally due to religious differences. An itinerant Zionist propagandist, in fulminating against the lot of the Jew in Soviet Russia, exclaimed : “ We do not want such emancipation as they can give us. We might have had that sort of emancipation five hundred years ago if we had consented to being baptised.” Which is wholly and completely false. After the anti-Jewish riots of 1391 in Castile and Aragon. thousands of Jews became converted. “ Whole communities went into the Christian faith,” says Sachar. “ The majority of the converts eagerly took advantage of the new position. They flocked in their hundreds and thousands to the places from which they had formerly been excluded by their faith. They entered forbidden professions and the quiet cloisters of the universities. They won important State positions, and penetrated into the sanctum sanctorum of the Church. Their power increased with their wealth, and many became eligible for admission into the oldest and most aristocratic families in Spain. Intermarriages were frequent, and within half a century virtually every noble house had infiltrations of Jewish blood. It is said, though without authority, that His Most Catholic Majesty King Ferdinand, who later signed the edict expelling the Jews from Spain, and Torquemada, the relentless Master of the Inquisition, were themselves descended from Jewish ancestors.

“THE TRAGIC CYCLE”

“Inevitably a wedge of hate cut through the relations of the old Christians and the new, who were despised for their success, for their pride, for their cynical adherence to Catholic practices. It rankled in the hearts of old Christians to see the Marranos in positions of trust and honour, in Court, in camp, and in Church, lording it over ancient families. How deep the hatred against the new Christians had become was demonstrated in 1449, when Toledo was called up to contribute a million maravedis for the defence of the frontier. The community rebelled, and tax-gatherers—most of them Marranos—were sent into the city to enforce the collections. Not only were they assaulted, but the houses of all new Christians were destroyed, and those who attempted to defend them or their property were brutally beaten or killed. All the King’s attempts to restore order failed, and he was compelled to watch feebly as the Council passed an edict forbidding new Christians to hold any public offices. The envenomed wording of the edict, Sentencia Estatuto, demonstrated clearly that the animosity sprang from more than a religious difference. It had become a genuine race hatred.”

“THE TRAGIC CYCLE”

Then, as now, embracing the true faith could not save the Jew. It might have solved the problem for a few scattered individuals, but wholesale baptism could not have emancipated the Jewish race. The Inquisition and the Expulsion forty years later become explicable only in the light of the foregoing. Here is one of the most significant periods in Jewish history, which illuminates both questions which we set out to answer. The struggle between feudalism and a rising merchant class had resulted in a victory for the former—but it was a victory that was won only because in this case the virile element of the merchant class consisted of Marranos and Jews.

Observe that the expulsion from Spain affected other known Jewish communities elsewhere. Stragglers drifted into every possible haven of refuge—into Navarre, into Portugal (where four years later all Jews were expelled), into Africa, into Naples, into Holland, Turkey, Germany, Crete, and even into the Papal States. Everywhere they went they brought with them the dread possibility of a similar fate to the settled Jewish communities. Everywhere they served to emphasise the precarious security of the Jew in an alien surrounding, just as to a smaller extent their expulsion from England and France two hundred years previously had brought to the Jews of Flanders, Lorraine, Burgundy, Dauphiné, and Provence the same realisation. The cumulative effect of each dispersion was to increase the resistance to absorption, and, more important still, to drive home the lesson that only by standing together as a community could the individual Jew obtain some protection for himself, his family, and his worldly possessions.

“ THE TRAGIC CYCLE ”

The Middle Ages represent the formative period of the modern Jew. The social ferment which was the motive power of the Crusades, coloured as it was by the romantic ideology of a religious war, brought the Jews into prominence as a definite factor in the life of Western Europe. Prior to that, their struggles were mainly on Asiatic soil. But with the eleventh century began the drawn-out struggle against feudalism. In that struggle against the chains of a decaying order, as in the modern struggle, the Jews were to bear the heat and burden of the day. They had become the principal visible agents of the money economy. To the impoverished common people and to the chivalry, they, as hucksters, usurers, and petty traders, represented the enemies of the existing social system. The economic status forced on them by the jealous restrictions of the guilds and crafts accentuated the differences of beliefs and customs. Many of the Crusaders were financed by Jews, and when the day of reckoning came it was easy to placate one's conscience with the thought that infidels and killers of Christ had no right to expect payment. The marauding Crusaders, as they passed through the Rhenish valley, Bohemia, and Hungary on their way to Palestine and Syria, persuaded themselves that in pillaging the Jewish communities and destroying their members they were performing a pious act. The Crusades, though they were to serve as solvents of the feudal State, though they were to increase enormously the economic contacts and commercial traffic between States, brought death and destruction to the Jews, because, from then on, trade rivalries and economic discontent were inextricably intertwined with dislike of the foreigner and of the unbeliever, and of the Jew, who was both.

“THE TRAGIC CYCLE”

Misery and unhappiness in Germany induced migration to Poland and Lithuania at the end of the thirteenth century. It is frequently forgotten that the much-despised Polish and Lithuanian Jew is in reality by ancestry a German Jew. To the student of social behaviour, nothing illustrates more forcibly the effect of environment in moulding the character of a people than the contrast between those German Jews who migrated to medieval Poland and those who remained.

“ THE TRAGIC CYCLE ”

We may see in the history of the Polish Jews an epitome of the ceaseless search by the race for security. Welcomed to Poland, and flocking there in great numbers from the Holy Roman Empire, they may well have thought that they had discovered the Promised Land. The contradictions within the Polish kingdom, however, spelt ruin not only to the Jews, but to the country itself. For a century there was comparative peace for the Jew, but the period which produced the Peasants' Revolts in the rest of Europe had the usual repercussions on Jewish life in Poland. In 1407, when John Capistrano, who had been appointed Inquisitor for the Jews, appeared at Cracow, there were riots, and the whole community was forcibly baptised. Economic conditions went from bad to worse in Poland. The attempt which had been made in 1551 to grant them virtual autonomy broke down in the general decay of the feudal system. Restrictions on Jewish life similar to those in the rest of Europe, stimulated by agitation from German competitors who had penetrated into Poland, forced the Jews into the position of usurers and tax-gatherers for the nobles. This did not add to their popularity with the peasantry. When at last the Cossacks rose, they vented their wrath on the Jewish agents of the Polish nobility. The rising of the Polish serfs against their masters, which accompanied the Cossack rebellion, led to the most revolting acts of cruelty against the Jews. Between 1649 and 1654, 100,000 Jews were slaughtered. In the century before the Partition of Poland they had undergone the usual demarcation. They were an alien people amidst warring classes. How intense these class differences were may be imagined from the ease with which Russia, Prussia, and Austria were able to conquer the ancient kingdom and divide the booty. But each robber country had perforce to swallow an enormous addition to its own quota of Jews. From the date of the Partition, the Polish Jews, who now became Russian Jews, Austrian Jews and Prussian Jews, had to bear not only sufferings peculiar to themselves but the added plight of conquered and exploited peoples.

“ THE TRAGIC CYCLE ”

If we contrast their lot with that of the Jews in Spain under Moslem rule, when Arab and Jewish cultures flowered so freely and so harmoniously together, we may perceive how greatly their material background affects the destiny of the Jews. It was a time of great prosperity, when commerce flourished and when the highly lucrative slave-trade was in its heyday. Arab and Jew plied similar trades. The feudal system had no real counterpart in Moslem history. As a nation of traders, there was no incompatibility for Arabs between feudal institutions and a merchant class, which threatened the stability of these institutions. The Arab was tolerant towards Christians and Jews, and the two peoples had more in common then than they have now, for at that time neither had developed the modern disease of nationalism. The animosities which had stirred the former rulers of Spain, the Visigoths, were thus not felt by their successors.

“THE TRAGIC CYCLE”

Similarly, the Jews who settled in Holland as fugitives from Spain after the Expulsion found their lot an easy one, cast in the prosperous atmosphere of developing maritime trade and commerce and of Holland's colonial expansion. To this day the Dutch Jew, in a country which has escaped most of the economic upheavals of her neighbours, knows little anti-Semitism in its cruder forms.

The fourteenth century, with its social revolutionary struggles—the Jacquerie in France and the Peasants' Revolts in England, Germany, and Flanders left its mark on Jewish history. The Black Death had aggravated social and economic discontent, and for this the Jews were blamed—just as to-day there is no conceivable catastrophe in which the anti-Semite does not detect the Jewish hand. Exploitation by the nobles, severity of taxation, filching of the common land, at last roused the peasantry to rebellion, and, as in modern times, there were not wanting astute rulers who could lay the blame on the Jew. It was the Jew who caused the plague and the misery of the poor, for is it not always easier to see the enemy in human form rather than in a system? Is it not surprising, therefore, that this period, a period of storm and strife which affected the poor of all countries, should see an enormous accentuation of hatred for the Jew. In a riot at Prague in 1389, 3,000 Jews were destroyed ; and this was typical of what occurred sporadically throughout the whole century.

“THE TRAGIC CYCLE”

The fifteenth century was characterised by a series of heretical Socialist movements throughout Europe. The Hussite wars, although national and religious on the surface, were definitely the first indications of the separate interests of a rising middle class, and exploited workers and peasants. The Communist Taborite colony of workers, handicraftsmen, and peasants was crushed finally only by the overwhelming force of a crusade instigated by the supporters of a feudal system rotten to the core. In this social cataclysm the Jews played their usual part. “The wave of persecution spread over Germany and Austria,” writes Sachar. “The massacres were accompanied by their usual forced baptism and the wholesale suicide of Jewish communities. In 1421, in Vienna, men and women were ruthlessly cut down, homes were burnt, synagogues were rased, and their stones were dragged away for the new university buildings. For a while not a single Jew remained in Austria.” It should be noted that what appears to us to be unbelievable cruelty was not solely the fate of the Jew. Torture on the rack, death by burning, and destruction of home were the fate of all heretics and social revolutionaries. Thirteen thousand Taborites were killed on the battlefield of Lipan in 1434. They had established a colony in which equality and freedom were to reign, and in which “the blessings and joys and knowledge and innocence and perfection which had characterised Adam before the Fall would be partaken by the comrades of the future State” (Beer). Which, of course, was blasphemy to the Church Militant.

“THE TRAGIC CYCLE”

The Reformation in the next century, and with it the infant beginnings of the national State and the first stirrings of nationalism, brought little comfort to the Jew wholly unable to find a niche in the welter of peoples who were beginning to crystallise into nations. These sixteenth and seventeenth centuries were the centuries of the ghetto. They formed the conditioning period of the Jew. Then was fashioned the Jew as the modern world was to see him later. Herded for the most part into unsavoury corners of the growing cities, almost completely segregated from the life around him, there was nothing left but the earnest study of his past, the revival of the Messianic hope and the eternal struggle for existence. He was divorced from the land and became a creature of the towns. Excluded from the guilds, he remained a petty trader and a pedlar. A few Jews grew to positions of trust, and from long apprenticeship their financial ability made them bankers to kings. This was the period of Court Jews, and now arose the expression, “As rich as a Jew.” Ironically enough, the Jews as a whole were never poorer. It was an insulated life not without its compensations, as Zangwill has shown in his ghetto tales, but it moulded the Jew into a form which was to make him even more of an alien to Western Europe when eventually the ghetto walls fell. It was to affect his physique, his mental horizon and even his moral outlook. A compassionate God, looking down at His world, must have grieved at the transformation in His Chosen People.

“THE TRAGIC CYCLE”

By the end of the eighteenth century and beginning of the nineteenth the feudal system had collapsed over the greater part of Europe. The age of Voltaire, Rousseau, Adam Smith, and Goethe should on the face of things have brought relief to the Jews, and in a great measure it did. The French Revolution and the Napoleonic era did away with the visible walls of the ghetto. The Jews who were told that they were aiding Jewish emancipation in fighting for the Revolution were being deceived, just as the poor and oppressed were deceived. The bourgeois State emerged with the bourgeoisie wholly triumphant. There were to be pickings for some Jews, but no more liberty, equality, or fraternity than for the common people who had fought the battles of the Revolution. The Jew, like the poor, received an instalment of liberty.

“ THE TRAGIC CYCLE ”

I have set out to show that the basic cause of anti-Semitism may be explained by the economic and geographic state of the Jew, and not by the fundamental, inherent make-up of either Jew or Gentile. If I have exaggerated these factors, it is because enough stress has not been laid on the material lot of the Jew, as an explanation of the development of the problem. That other factors have entered I shall not attempt to deny, but they are externals to the main thesis. The relentless struggle of man to adapt himself to his economic environment has spelt ruthless cruelty and oppression to his fellow-creatures. Not the least of the sufferers have been the Jews.

“THE TRAGIC CYCLE”

I have dealt with the general aspect in one chapter, and have attempted an analysis of the present situation in Germany in another. In this short review I have endeavoured to show that the crises in the history of the Jews have been synchronous with crises arising in the course of social evolution.

In science, when a theory is propounded, experimental proof of its validity is necessary, and convincing proof is achieved only when control experiments are available. In the social sciences it is scarcely ever possible to have control experiments. It is not often that human groups can be subjected to tests such as are made in the laboratory. But, fortunately, my thesis that anti-Semitism, with all its concomitant emotional and sentimental excrescences, is fundamentally an economic problem, can be subjected to experimental proof. That proof, as convincing as any test-tube demonstration, is there for all to see. It is this factual verification of the theory which we must now examine.

THE LABORATORY

EACH AGE has its recrudescence of the Jewish problem and the Jewish question. Each country goes through a period when it is coping with the ubiquitous Jew. It is this process which brings a realisation that the perennial nuisance of dealing with him constitutes a problem. Thus in our generation it is the German Jew who is in the limelight. To the generation or two preceding the war it was the Russian Jew who brought to the rest of Western Europe and America vivid reminders of a historical process which they themselves had experienced. The struggle of the vast, unwieldy Russian Empire to deal with a problem which, at the best of times, presupposes an enlightened régime, could not fail to have repercussions even beyond its widely separated frontiers. For fifty years preceding the Great War, statesmen of other nations had periodically to adopt self-righteous attitudes in protesting to the Russian Government against its treatment of Jews.

That the Jews suffered most should not blind us to the fact that Russia had to deal with many other racial minorities inhabiting the Empire, and that the drive for homogeneity and the creation of a united Russian nation implied hardship and oppression for them as well. It was perhaps the dispersion of the Jews and their access to European Foreign Offices that made the Jewish voice heard above the clamour of the conflicting elements which were being subjected to the process of Russianisation. To Jew and Gentile alike the periodic pogroms which scandalised European civilisation from 1880 onwards were strange phenomena explicable only on the assumption that the Russian people were inherently barbaric and that the blessings of culture and traditions of freedom had somehow passed by Russia, just as to-day the German war on the Jew is regarded by myopic observers as a manifestation of Teutonic savagery.

THE LABORATORY

It is true, of course, that illiteracy and ignorance characterised the Russia of those days. But this only made it easier to delude the Russian masses into believing that the Jew was responsible for their troubles. Illiteracy and ignorance, as isolated factors, are not sufficient to initiate pogroms. The economic background of Russian Jewry supplies the missing link.

By the Partition of Poland, Russia added one million Polish Jews to her population. The restrictions and persecutions which had been the lot of these Jews had had two effects. They had converted them into urban petty traders, typical middlemen. Excluded from agriculture, they nevertheless dealt in the products of agriculture. They bought and sold whatever they could. The middleman has never been popular with the primary producer, and when he is a Jew his popularity does not increase. In the larger towns Jews were, for the most part, small innkeepers, moneylenders, dealers in second-hand goods, and artisans—tailors, cigarette-makers, and cobblers. The charge of parasitism was levelled against them, and, as usual, the parasites were criticised, but not the system which produced parasitism. Hence frequent recriminations and even riots.

THE LABORATORY

The second effect of the Polish process of conditioning had been to create a narrowing of Jewish interests. It had kept alive Yiddish, the language brought with them from medieval Germany ; it had given rabbinical institutions almost secular authority, and had produced, indeed, a State within a State.

Russia had to deal with a million such Jews, as well as millions of rebellious Poles, Finns, Letts, and countless other dissenting minorities. It was the peculiar position of the Jews which made it possible for her treatment of them to be especially brutal and inhumane. As middlemen in a predominantly agricultural country it was possible to encompass their ruin without disturbing noticeably the economic fabric of the country. As members of a dissenting religion it was possible, in a priest-ridden country, to use them as scapegoats for the increasing discontent of an impoverished peasantry, and, as non-nationals of a country which was beginning to be infected with nationalism, to point to them as "unassimilable aliens" disturbing to its national unity.

THE LABORATORY

In their liberal moments even the Russian rulers saw that in these factors lay the vulnerability of the Jew to popular hatred and contempt. At varying intervals sporadic attempts were made to overcome them. Thus, in 1801, under Alexander I, the pale was extended. (The pale of settlement had been created by Catherine, and, by restricting the entrance of Jews into merchant and artisan guilds, compelled them to live in certain districts only.) Jews were encouraged to become agriculturists, but, since no provision was made to transplant and train them as such, very few availed themselves of the opportunity. All schools were opened to them, and they could buy crown lands. It was an attempt to make the Jew enter "productive" enterprise. Great efforts also were made to convert them to Christianity, and Nicholas I endeavoured still further to break down the separation of Jews by increasing the facilities for secular education. His son, Alexander II, in an effort to stem the tide of general discontent which was threatening to break down his autocratic régime, freed 40 million serfs and granted increased privileges to the Jews.

THE LABORATORY

But the revolutionary movement, which the archaic feudalism of Russia had brought into being, refused to be placated by the grudging concessions of the Tsar. The liberation of landless serfs had created an even more acute problem. The policy of liberalism proving inadequate, it was replaced by more restrictions and further persecutions. In 1881, Alexander II was assassinated; and his son, and, after him, his grandson Nicholas II, carried on the traditions of repression.

In the welter of revolution and agitation the lot of the Jew inevitably grew worse. It was at this period that the now popular ruse of labelling all revolutionary movements Jewish came into being. That many Jews should belong to illegal organisations is understandable enough, but the vast mass of Russian Jewry lived in perpetual fear of pogroms and further restrictions of their privileges without holding any revolutionary views.

Up to 1914 there was no country in the world where the Jew was hated more than in Russia.

THE LABORATORY

Restrictions on his daily life were bad enough, but there was the constant threat of physical violence, of murder and rapine, which led to colossal emigration from the country. Jews fled in hundreds of thousands to America, where, as a consequence, they changed the existing pattern of Jewish life. It is essential for us to visualise the condition of Jews in pre-war Russia. The pale limited their movements ; educational restrictions, such as exist to-day in Germany, severely limited their entrance to the high schools and universities. Economic demarcation forced them to compete desperately in the struggle for existence. The "Black Hundreds," the Storm Troops of those days, hired to instigate pogroms, terrorised their lives. Russian writers and poets of the period, reacting to the popular notions of the Jew, painted him as the universal rogue, cheat, and blackguard. Even Nazi Germany cannot compete in its execration of the Jew with Tsarist Russia.

What is the position in Russia twenty years after the outbreak of the Great War ? Different observers come back from Russia with different interpretations of the success or failure of Communism. One records its imminent collapse, another the inception of a new age. But one feature of life in Russia remains unchallenged. There is no anti-Semitism. The little that exists is fast dying out. The Jew is free to move where he wills. His access to schools and universities is not restricted by reason of his race. He is encouraged and helped to find employment in agriculture, industry, and commerce.

THE LABORATORY

“At the present time,” writes Dimanstein, “factory workers among Jews constitute twenty per cent as compared with four per cent under the Tsar, while the percentage of farmers has grown from one to twelve, and the proportion of self-supporting Jews is now higher than it is among many advanced nationalities in the U.S.S.R.” Since the Revolution three large Jewish national regions have been created in the Ukraine—Kalinindorf, Stalindorf, and Novoslatopolski regions—as well as the Freidorf area in the Crimea. A Jewish national autonomous region is to be built up in Biro-Bidjan. Even the columns of the Jewish Press in other countries, which week after week recount the dreary tale of woe, and ferret out every Jewish grievance, have ceased to record ill treatment of Russian Jews. These columns, which used to thunder protest against the tyrannical government of the Tsar, now describe the settlement of the Jews on the land. There is still talk of the persecution of the Jewish religion, but at least there is no complaint that it is directed exclusively against the Jewish religion. The Jew in Russia is free from that form of social discrimination which the emancipated Jew of Europe and America feels to-day—that social snobbery which makes even the Jewish millionaire fear the snigger of his Gentile butler. He is free from the nightmare of physical torment and social ostracism. And if we say he is not free from Communist bureaucracy, that he is not free to support the establishment of a nationalist bourgeois State, at least he shares these disabilities in common with all Russians. If his standard of living is lower than that of Jews in capitalist countries, it is no lower than that of other Russians, or, if it is, it is not because he is a Jew.

THE LABORATORY

In the short space of twenty years, from being a veritable hell for Jews, Russia has become a country where they can face their neighbours untroubled by any thoughts of inferiority. From the degraded status of the Tsarist régime to perfect equality is surely an amazing transformation. It is not to be forgotten that this change took place, and is taking place, at a time when the position of the emancipated Jew elsewhere was, and is, being challenged. There is not a country in Europe where to-day strong factions are not demanding his exclusion from public life. What is it that has effected this transformation? There has been no great religious revival, no resurgence of moral values, no biological change in the Russian people. But there has been a revolutionary innovation in economic thought and practice.

THE LABORATORY

Before proceeding to an analysis of the importance of the Russian Revolution to the Jew, I must deal with one bogey. Nobody, except Mr. Belloc possibly, believes to-day that the Russian Revolution was a Jewish movement to serve Jewish ends. There were, in 1927, 45,342 Jewish members of the Communist Party in the U.S.S.R., out of a total of 1,061,860. To imagine that a population of 160 million people would endure the hardships of blockade, Allied intervention, and the heartbreaking rigours of the Five-Year Plan for the sake of three million others, whom previously they had hated intensely, is to be wilfully blind to hard facts. In order to mislead such a vast population, the Jews must indeed have been possessed of Machiavellian cunning. It should not be necessary to emphasise this, nor need it delay us much longer. In the early days of the Revolution, however, when little enough was known about Russia, it was possible to talk of the Jewish Bolshevik Revolution. Such claptrap is impossible now.

To understand the status of the Jew in Russia to-day it is necessary to know something of the Communist theory with regard to nationalism.

THE LABORATORY

There is no clearer account of this available than in Hans Kohn's Nationalism in the Soviet Union, and for what follows I am indebted mainly to him and the writings of Lenin. It was mainly upon Lenin that the duty devolved of clearing the standpoint of the Bolsheviks in nationalism. Many members of the party, believing that Communism was essentially international, were totally opposed to the granting of national freedom to minorities. They held the view that to encourage nationalism was to vitiate the possibility of an international culture. Nationalism was reactionary, they argued, and a product of the bourgeois State. As such it deserved scant sympathy. Multiplication of languages and national cultures could only becloud the straightforward issue of the fight against capitalism. It would encourage the bourgeois element in the revolutionary party, and tempt the proletariat from its clearly assigned task.

Lenin was a realist above all things. He disagreed profoundly with the internationalists. And in the end his view prevailed. There are, in Russia, over 160 national groups, widely dissimilar in language, customs, traditions, and level of cultural attainments : the Jews form only one national minority ; so that the problem of nationalities was exceedingly important to Soviet Russia. "For Lenin," Kohn writes, "the question of nationality had no independent existence ; it was a subsidiary problem of the social revolution, and it could not be dealt with in isolation from the questions of the domination of capital, the fight against imperialism, and the proletarian dictatorship. It was within this complex of questions that a solution had to be found for the question of nationality, for the sake of the wider aim of the liberation of the oppressed masses of all nations. In his championship of the right of all people to complete self-determination, he had no idea of dividing up the surface of the earth, and the field it offered to the economic and social activity of man, into a multiplicity of rigidly isolated States. His goal was the rapprochement of the peoples and their freedom into associations and economic units of the maximum dimensions, even of world-wide dimensions. But he was aware that this rapprochement could only be effected on the basis of the freedom and voluntary adhesion of the various peoples.

THE LABORATORY

"The slightest oppression of one people by another, any privilege of nationality or tongue, any identification of the State or empire with the interests of a particular nation, as wielder of the authority of the State or empire, was bound to arouse opposition among the people or offshoots of people thereby placed at a disadvantage, to kindle a combative nationalism, and to wreck the one condition essential to fraternal collaboration and mutual support between the workers of all peoples, and the building up of a new social order. Lenin, with his keen sense of the necessity of a policy based on a thorough grasp of realities and a full weighing of them, resisted every attempt to belittle the national question from an 'international' point of view. . . . Lenin saw no unalterable force, ineradicable from human nature, in nationalism ; he saw in the nation no God-given ordering of human existence, ordained for all time. He realised that in its historic association a nation is the product of a definite stage in history. In his view the bourgeois era was also the era of the development of nationalism. . . . Thus, with the achievement of Socialism, nationalism will gradually disappear, and the nationality question will steadily lose importance. It is just in order that this final goal may be reached, and not for its own sake, that at the present time nationalism must be recognised as a factor and taken into account. This recognition will give nationalism a relative character, in place of the absolute character which it had during the last century and a half as a final goal of political, social, and cultural activity, a fulfilment of nationhood for its own sake, for the sake of its sublimity and its historic mission" (Hans Kohn).

THE LABORATORY

THE LABORATORY

At this stage we may ask in what way such policy differs from that of any Liberal statesman of the nineteenth century. Most enlightened nationalists—and there are not many such—concede in theory similar freedom to other nationalities. Thus Dr. J. Holland Rose (Nationality in Modern History) writes: "After the attainment of civic freedom and national solidarity the national instinct, which strengthens with opposition and weakens after due satisfaction, ought to merge in the wider and nobler sentiment of human brotherhood in the attainment of which it is only a preparatory phase." In theory, then, Lenin and Dr. J. Holland Rose are in complete agreement as to the nature of nationality, except that the latter talks of "the national instinct," which is a meaningless phase. Both, in any event, recognise the dialectic nature of nationalism, which is more than most nationalists do. But there is a world of difference between the development of nationalism as envisaged by Lenin and by Dr. Rose. For with Lenin there is to be the preparatory phase of the dictatorship of the proletariat—"until the proletarian policy had succeeded in extirpating the peoples' hatred and mistrust of one another, until the great differences in civilisation and in standard of living between the dominant and subject peoples had been wiped out by education and economic policy, and the masses had been invested with the spirit of internationalism and of fraternal neighbourliness between the peoples" (Kohn).

Herein lies the kernel of this book. It is my thesis that no other possibility for genuine Jewish emancipation exists, any more than it exists for any other national minority.

Other countries have before now conceded national freedom on paper. In England and America to-day the Jew has complete civic freedom. His language rights are assured. He may educate his children in his own language if he chooses. He may live in an almost completely Jewish atmosphere, as far as it is possible to create such an atmosphere where another culture is dominant. But no measure of legal freedom has rendered him persona grata in his environment, nor has it done much to ease the hostility of his neighbours. In the Press and in the national literature he is held up to slight and ridicule, and is always conscious that the freedom he possesses is not his by alienable right, but by condescension of his hosts.

National minority rights were conceded to the smaller groups of Austria, Poland,

THE LABORATORY

Rumania, and other countries by the treaties of Versailles and St. Germain. These pledges were never honoured, because the treaties could not change the contempt and dislike which the inhabitants of these countries had for the Jew—feelings which, in the last analysis, depended upon economic differences and the competitive struggle.

The nationalism which capitalist countries engender leads to war. The nationalism which Socialism encourages leads to co-operation and world peace. Capitalist nationalism is static. In it the dominance of private property leads to a scramble for markets, for spheres of influence, and so to international wars and anarchy. Socialist nationalism is dynamic. It recognises nationalism as a transient phase in human development, and seeks to exploit no subject race. Capitalist nationalism cannot afford to give unfettered freedom to minority groups. Socialist nationalism regards it as its bounden duty to do so from motives of self-preservation. For only when all sections of the people are convinced of the necessity for Socialism can there be peace within the borders of a country.

Freedom, then, is not enough. The breakdown of national hatreds must be preceded by the breakdown of class antagonism. Only Socialism and the classless society can achieve this.

THE LABORATORY

In practice the policy of the Soviets is to encourage the growth of national languages and literature. In the case of many backward nations, their language had to be resuscitated and a literature created. The purpose of this was to train members of these groups in Socialist principles, and to grant them full educational facilities so that their own people could gain access to administrative and economic posts. There could thus be no undermining of the economic condition, no dominance of the non-Russian peoples by the more advanced and powerful groups. No minor nationality was to be exploited by a ruling nation. And so there could be no cry in Russia of Jewish domination any more than the Jew could maintain that he was being differentiated against.

Kohn writes : " The Soviet Government has no desire at all for the assimilation or the extinction of the Jewish people. It envisages in the future a Jewish, Yiddish-speaking people, as vigorous and as thoroughly imbued with the Communist idea as Russians or Tartars or Buriats. But the Jewish people of the Union must be entirely dissociated from Judaism ; instruction in the Hebrew language and the perpetuation of Jewish religious culture as it has been developed through more than three thousand years, forming and giving outward expression to the characteristic spirit of the Jewish people, are forbidden. The Jewish people is thus cut off entirely from the success of its culture . . . only the popular elements of the existing national cultures, unassociated with traditional religion and close to the life of the masses, are to be retained and interwoven with the new uniform Socialist culture. . . . All peoples of the Soviet Union are entirely equal in rights and in consideration. But free in their political form and in their development they are not. They are free only within the narrow limits permitted by a Socialist Soviet Republic."

THE LABORATORY

These objections are raised in all seriousness by many Jews as well as by Dr. Kohn. It is the argument used by Zionists in contrasting their work in Palestine with that of the Soviets in Russia. They desire cultural continuity with the past, and any State which, in their opinion, cuts Jewry off from its cultural heritage is not allowing complete freedom to the Jew. Such freedom, they maintain, can only be achieved in a State where the specific spirit of Jewish culture is allowed to flower freely. And it is only in the historic contact with the Jewish past which Palestine affords that this cultural continuity is able to enhance the specific Jewish qualities which have enriched the world. Among Jews to-day such criticism constitutes the real objection against the practice of the Communist State. To the ardent Jewish youth, inspired by nationalism, Communism spells death and decay for the Jewish race. The spellbinders of Zionism have the centre of the stage, and it is Zionism which they hold out as the salvation of Jewish national values.

THE LABORATORY

First as to the "cultural heritage of the past." There is no stronger influence in the Jewish past than the voice of the prophets. To any Jew acquainted with his own history there is no prouder boast he can make than that he belongs to the people of the Book. The Jew gave the Bible to the world, and the message of his prophets, though largely ignored, is its most enduring contribution. And the message is not unlike the message of Karl Marx. If "cultural heritage" meant anything, all Jews would be Socialists, as would all Christians if the tradition of Christianity really shaped their lives.

But essentially what these objections ignore is the dialectic process in Nature, the changing character of human institutions. To Jewish nationalists, as to all other nationalists, there is something permanent in national divisions, each nation outdoing the other in throwing off cultural contributions to the rest of the world. Each nation, in this conception, lives in a watertight compartment, and altruistically keeps other benighted nations supplied with the by-products of its peculiar genius. There must be an anchorage to the past ; culture must be rooted in tradition, and tradition must guard and shape future development. It would be an evil day indeed for Jews if other nations looked to the guidance of past tradition and custom for their treatment of Jews !

THE LABORATORY

If the Jew is to shape his development in cultural continuity with the past, he must either use that past to modify his institutions or he must retain the institutions of the past. If he modifies them, his past becomes merely of historic interest, and there is nothing, as far as I know, which prevents Jews from studying their past history in Soviet Russia. If he moulds his institutions on those of his past, he will soon enough see them destroyed in a world where change is the only constant feature. It is difficult to contend with nationalists, for they take refuge so readily in words and phrases which make it difficult to pin them down. When they talk of freedom to develop specific cultures, what they really mean, in the last analysis, is freedom to glorify the achievements of their own race, to boast of their past, to extol their own superiority over other races, to indulge in most of the antics which characterise rampant nationalism. They talk of providing universal values which only the genius of their race can produce, and remain oblivious of the universal values which have been given to the world by other peoples.

THE LABORATORY

Suppose England became a Socialist State. It is true that there would be no language problem. It would not be necessary to prevent any Englishman from studying his past history. No one would deprive him of reading and venerating the noble creations of his national writers. He would not be prevented from loving its hedges, its green fields, or its country lanes. But, if his preoccupation with his past led him to make demands for a return to the feudal system (like the hankerings of those corpulent chatterers, Messrs. Chesterton and Belloc), and if he insisted that he was not really free because he and others like him wished to develop along lines which they read into their national traditions, he would be promptly locked up, and rightly so. It would become necessary then, in order to prevent regular recrudescences of such displays of petulance, to ensure that the educational system ceased to allure young Englishmen with tales of England's glory, with stories of England's past (and, by implication, England's future)—with all tendencies, in fact, which cast a glamour over institutions abhorrent to a Socialist State.

The fact that such culture, and propaganda for its perpetuation, had in fact been the prop of the bourgeois State, would make it even more imperative that it should be kept from contaminating the minds of young Englishmen. To complain, under such circumstances, of the "limited freedom of a narrow Socialist State" is the merest pedantry. Is it expected that a Socialist State should, on its establishment, at once encourage the growth of those forces which tend to disrupt it? It is as reasonable to ask capitalist States to encourage the education of children in Communist principles and to disseminate Communist propaganda. In asking for such "freedom" the Jews would be endeavouring to bring into harmony two opposing and contradictory tendencies in national culture. The sum total of those features of contemporary life which are lumped together as characteristic of its culture is really an expression of such matter-of-fact things as the way we earn our livelihood, and the methods by which we are allowed to earn it. To divorce culture from its economic substratum, to leave it suspended in mid-air, is to be oblivious to the fundamental facts of life.

THE LABORATORY

Now, as to the learning of Hebrew. In their attitude to nationalism the Soviets allow each group the freest and fullest use of its own language. Courts of law, schools, and all official literature are conducted in the language of the group. It is completely unreasonable to expect the Soviets to allow the Jews two official languages. There would be no end to such multiplication. Russia would become even more polyglot than it is. Which, then, should the Soviets regard as the official language—Yiddish or Hebrew? Yiddish was spoken by practically 90 per cent of Russian Jews. I doubt if 10 per cent could speak Hebrew with any degree of fluency. From practical considerations only, Yiddish has superior claims. Let us admit freely that nowadays practical considerations do not weigh with language enthusiasts. But it is to be remembered that Hebrew had powerful associations with the religious liturgy of the Jews, that its renaissance in Palestine bore all the characteristics of a revival of nationalism of the bourgeois brand. If Hebrew became the official language of Russian Jews, it could not fail to revive in them an identity of interest with the group of Jews embarking on the erection of another capitalist State in Palestine. The political and economic structure of Palestinian life could not fail to colour Hebrew literature and Hebrew art. "All art is propaganda," and Zionist propaganda runs counter to Communist ideals. Is it any wonder that Hebrew is frowned upon in Russia, and that Yiddish is encouraged? There is nothing to prevent a Jew in Russia from learning Hebrew or talking Hebrew—but he cannot expect official cognisance of the language, nor is any effort made to teach it in the schools.

THE LABORATORY

If freedom for the Jew implies freedom to dabble in practices which, if conceded to other national groups, would lead speedily to the disintegration of the U.S.S.R., he would indeed be exchanging the shadow for the substance. For the destruction of Communism would mean a return of the Jew to the rôle which he played in pre-Communist Russia. I know that there are those who believe that persecution with the retention of national ideals is preferable to freedom without it. Can one not hear the fervid Zionist say, "Better that the nation should die than that it should lose its soul"? But I think the Russian Jews might at least be consulted before they are asked to choose death as an alternative.

In the end, of course, the proof of the pudding lies in the eating. Emigration from Russia of Jews is of infinitesimal proportions. The Jews who do leave are of the older generation, which finds it difficult to adapt itself to new conditions. Such persecution of the Hebrew language, literature, and Zionism as exists is led by Jews themselves and not by Russians. And, definitely, there are no complaints from Jews as to conditions in Russia for them. They appear to be strangely unmoved by the clamour raised by Zionists and orthodox religious Jewry about their spiritual decay.

THE LABORATORY

Above all, one never hears in Russia those silly, sententious words : the Jewish problem. There is no Jewish problem. There is no Jewish question ; not because there are no Jews, but because at last a man may be a Jew without constraint or offence. Despite the talk of assimilation through mixed marriage, there were still two and three-quarter million Russian Jews in 1933—an increase of 200,000 since 1926.

And if, in the long run (and, from the nature of things, it will have to be a very long run), the “ characteristic spirit ” of Jewry dies out, will that in itself not add further proof that there is no “ characteristic spirit ” of Jewry ? For if the characteristic spirit dies out in a new environment, may not what is regarded as the “ characteristic spirit ” itself be the product of previous economic environment ?

The fact of the matter is, of course, that all such complaints as to lack of freedom under Communism are not based on rational thought. They are rationalisations of an instinctive hankering after the old gods. At heart these nationalists are reactionary. For them the past has a romantic halo. They see only the purple patches, and not the grey drabness which encompasses the life of the ordinary man—Jewish history is for them a procession of great names—not the march of legions of nameless victims of mob fury and massacre. They remain oblivious to the sobering fact that hundreds of thousands of Jews in Eastern Europe desire to-day not so much the gaudy trappings of racial pride as security for themselves and their children. Zionism, with the best will in the world, cannot promise it to them.

THE LABORATORY

I have said that Russia affords us the spectacle of a vast laboratory experiment in the social sciences. In less than twenty years, from being a country in which no Jew could live with self-respect it has emerged as the only country in which he can face the future without qualm. There must be a reason.

Fundamentally the “Jewish problem” is an economic one. Other phases of anti-Semitism are side-issues. They are incidental to the main source of the trouble.

NEW MESSIAHS FOR OLD?

I THINK I have shown that the Jewish problem, whatever it may have been in the past, is linked up to-day with the problem of national differences. Even Hitler concedes freedom of worship to the German Jews, and universal baptism would not ensure the removal of the "Aryan" paragraph. The emphasis now is not on the blood of the Lamb, but on that of His disciples.

If the handling of the question of nationalism and national minorities is of paramount importance to the Jew, it has equal significance for the non-Jew, and consequently an examination of contemporary policy with regard to it is of more than academic interest. The three dominant systems of government, Democracy, Fascism, and Communism, display a marked contrast in their appraisal of the question.

"The British Empire," writes Professor Carlton Hayes, "in so far as its self-governing dominions is concerned, is a federation of nationalities and national States, in which divergent local and national differences are not altogether incompatible with the claims of a unifying patriotism." Which is true, of course, of those portions of the Empire which have achieved national autonomy by virtue of their own aggressive nationalism. But it leaves untouched the unsatisfied national needs of millions of natives who have been left to the tender mercies of a dominant nationalism, which exploits them as mercilessly as imperialism exploited them in the past.

NEW MESSIAHS FOR OLD?

The movement for the self-government of India has been obstructed as long as was decently possible. In a burst of candour the late Lord Brentford (Sir William Joynson-Hicks) said : " We did not conquer India for the benefit of the Indians. I know in missionary circles it is said that we conquered India to raise the level of the Indians. This is cant. We conquered India as an outlet for the goods of Great Britain. We conquered India by the sword, and by the sword we should hold it. I am interested in missionary work of that kind, but I am not such a hypocrite as to say that we hold India for the Indians. We hold it as the finest outlet for British goods in general and for Lancashire cotton goods in particular."

It is true that the position is seldom stated with such brutal frankness. Kipling, singing the glory of the British Raj, is far removed from thoughts of cotton goods ; but sober realists like Mr. Winston Churchill and Lord

NEW MESSIAHS FOR OLD?

Lloyd know well enough that, once India governs itself, tariffs will keep out British goods ; and the Indian Civil Service, the Indian Army, and the Indian Medical Service will be manned by Indians. Indian self-government will come, not as a willing gift from British democracy, but because conquest by the sword is not proof against an economic boycott.

Nor when Indian self-government is achieved will it solve the problem of national minorities in India. The depressed castes will find that Indian manufacturers, Indian landowners, and an Indian petty bourgeoisie can keep them in a condition of inferior national status as effectively as the alien British. Pace Professor Carlton Hayes—the East African negro, the Singalese, and the South African Bantu have still a long path to tread before they may be said to have attained full national freedom within the British Empire.

France exploits her colonists as successfully as do other colonial powers. Periodic unrest in Morocco is almost as frequent as on the North-West Frontier of India.

In Czecho-Slovakia the Slovaks, who form 15 per cent of the population, are discriminated against by the Czechs ; 68 per cent of the emigrants from Czecho-Slovakia are Slovaks. In Belgium the Flemish, German, and French elements are constantly at loggerheads. In Bessarabia, the Rumanians rule the native element with an iron hand.

NEW MESSIAHS FOR OLD?

America, the melting-pot, is the scene of much national squabbling. Far from being a homogeneous nation, forged from its many immigrants, there is much ill feeling and social discrimination against Poles, Italians, and Jews—all the elements, in fact, which excited the ire of the Ku Klux Klan, and are anathema to such ultra-patriotic bodies as the American Legion and the Daughters of the American Revolution. America's negro citizens, far from having achieved the dignity of equality of status, are not even assured of ordinary justice.

"Democracy," then, has no contribution to make towards the solution of national differences. The League of Nations, now the League of some Nations, created by "democratic" States, has been unable to protect Manchuria from its military occupation by Japan. The fourth All-European Congress of Minorities, subsidiary to the League, passed the following resolution: "Forty million people belonging to the National Minorities are losing confidence in the League of Nations as a guardian of minority rights; to date the League, because of the methods it applies, has done nothing to effect a solution of the 'Minorities problem.'"

NEW MESSIAHS FOR OLD?

The theory of the democratic State acting as the guardian of less advanced nations, until such time as they are fit to govern themselves, amounts in practice to the retention of power until wars of liberation, political agitation, passive resistance and economic boycotts succeed in shaking off the benevolent protectors.

This is what the modern "democratic" State has to offer, though it is probably a task of supererogation to enquire into its management of nationalism, since the demise of democracy is announced on all sides to be near at hand. It is to the new doctrine of government—Fascism—which we must turn for enlightenment on this twentieth-century problem.

Fascism, even in its mildest form, is bound up with the theory of race supremacy. Tucked away somewhere in all Fascist declarations of faith there is insistence on the importance of race. There is a narrow, rigid exclusiveness even in the Austrian and Italian varieties which bodes ill for minor groups. In Germany, of course, this theory of race has been raised to the dizzy heights of a national religion. Legally, in that country, full citizenship is conceded only to the members of a "blood-group," which earnest professors are now endeavouring, not without difficulty, to define. The doctrines of Spengler, who is regarded as a representative German philosopher, find expression in the most intoxicated nationalist ravings. "The Celtic German race," he writes, "is the most strong-willed the world has ever seen, and to be Prussian is to be healthy and of sound instinct. Germany is the decisive country of the world . . . because the German people are young enough to undertake, to define, to mould the problems of world development while other peoples have become too old and stiff to do anything but stay on the defensive."

NEW MESSIAHS FOR OLD?

It is fairer, perhaps, to assess the actual achievements of Fascism in this field than to judge it by its theoretic programme.

Poland contains national minorities comprising about 40 per cent of its inhabitants. A number of districts are inhabited chiefly by Ukrainians, White Russians, and Germans; they have no national rights. "The land of the Ukrainian and White Russian peasants has been expropriated and divided among the Polish militarists. From 1920 to 1925 the Ukrainians lost 2,607 schools. Out of 1,000 Ukrainian students, only 79 can attend schools conducted in their own language; 921 are compelled to attend either Polish or two-language schools. In 1925, 84 per cent of all the schools in the Ukraine were Polish. . . . It has been proven that 200,000 hectares of the cultivated land in Eastern Galicia and Poland have been handed over to Polish colonists. Polish agricultural unions received 79 million zloties during the current year, while the Ukrainian unions, whose number is close to 3,000, received nothing" (Rysakoff).

NEW MESSIAHS FOR OLD?

Italy exploits the Southern Tyrolese and Slavonians and deprives them of their national identity. Japan's exploits in Manchuria are recent history. The announcement of her intention to hold herself responsible for "order" in China, and her warning to the rest of the world to leave China alone, show clearly enough that she regards the unfortunate country as her own preserve.

Poland and Germany have unenviable records in their treatment of Jewish minorities. Polish Jews are subjected to discriminatory laws, are cordially disliked and correspondingly treated. We need not again dwell on Germany's treatment of her Jews.

Fascism shows no improvement on "democracy" in its treatment of national differences. Nor need it surprise us. The conflicting claims of nationalism can only be reconciled in the absence of class antagonism. And class antagonism cannot disappear completely except in the classless society. Neither "democracy" nor Fascism can resolve class antagonism.

We have recently been given an indication of how Fascism proposes to do away with the class-war. Herr Hitler's "Army of Labour" is founded on the awe-inspiring discovery that if a factory worker is dubbed Private Schmidt instead of Herr Schmidt, and his employer Captain Thyssen, he will immediately lose all resentment at the thought that his superior officer's income is a million marks and his own five thousand. And, instead of having troublesome trades unions, which create class feeling, the benevolent Government will appoint a Labour Trustee to act as a referee between captain and private. A similar scheme functions in Italy, where workmen's wages show a suspicious inclination to approximate those of workers in non-Fascist countries, and unemployment figures to tally pro rata with those of less fortunate countries. It remains to be seen whether this method of dealing with the class-war will meet with any success. If the assertion that nationalism cannot be diverted into peaceful channels unless class conflicts cease is correct, we may hope for little contribution to the problem of nationalism and national minorities from Fascism.

NEW MESSIAHS FOR OLD?

There remain the possibilities in the Socialist State. I have shown that in Russia the granting of full national rights has meant more than the mere right to use a national language, and equality in the sight of the law. Backward nationalities have been developed in their economic as well as their cultural status, in recognition of the fact that unless each national unit has full control of its own destiny, and is not exploited by another, there can be no talk of national independence.

NEW MESSIAHS FOR OLD?

There have been signs in Russia that with an acceleration in the development of nationalism some of the Soviet Republics desire to break away from the Federation of Republics, and to develop into bourgeois States. This has been due to the fact that the permeation of Communist theory has not kept pace with economic and cultural development. Advanced nationalities have shown impatience at being tied to more backward groups, and a strong body of opinion within the Communist Party looks with disapproval upon what they call pandering to bourgeois nationalism. Thus far, however, the policy of Lenin is being faithfully carried out.

The fear that national cultures will be swamped by an international culture in the Socialist State is best answered in the words of Stalin : " In reality the period of the dictatorship of the proletariat, and the building of Socialism in the U.S.S.R., is the period in which national culture, Socialist in content and national in form, flourishes. Apparently they don't understand that the development of national cultures must proceed with redoubled strength after the introduction and establishment of general compulsory elementary education in the respective national languages. They fail to understand that only if national cultures develop will it be possible really to draw the backward nationalities into the cause of Socialist construction " (political report to the 16th Party Congress by J. Stalin).

NEW MESSIAHS FOR OLD?

This is sufficient answer to those who think that the policy in Russia of building Socialism in one country, once it has achieved economic independence, may give rise to Russian chauvinism and Russian aggression. Such criticisms lose sight of the fact that Russia comprises within its frontiers not one, but one hundred and sixty-seven, nations. Within Soviet Russia, in other words, there is a League of Nations, much more genuinely a league than the League whose headquarters is at Geneva. Many of these groups have racial affinities with peoples outside Russia—Germans, Mohammedans, Jews, Ukrainians, and White Russians.

It is unlikely that the immediate future will show the various elements making up Russia to-day blended into a grey, amorphous mass, indistinguishable from each other by their cultural output. A great deal of nonsense has been written on the factors which influence the specific characters in national culture. I have previously quoted Mr. Bernard Joseph. Here is what he has to say on this subject : “ The apostolic fervour of the Hebrew prophets could only have been aroused in their national homeland. The traditions of a nationality are soaked into its soil and are reabsorbed by succeeding generations. The influence of geographical environment on the formation of national culture and character is indeed remarkable. The Russian is as morose and melancholy as the steppes of his country. The Norwegian is as silent as the bleak, snow-capped mountains of Norway. The Italian, warmed by the sun of Southern Italy, full of colour, is passionate and excitable. A nationality is more than the group of men who comprise it. The ideas which are the peculiar possession of the nationality are an inseparable part of it. It is on the soil of the homeland that these ideas and their consequent ideals thrive. The homeland, the seat of the nationality’s history, lends them colour and spirit.

NEW MESSIAHS FOR OLD?

“ There is in each nationality a tendency to emphasise and act according to those manifestations of individuals or collective life of the national group which are characteristic of it, and are the result of its accumulated teachings and traditions. The Englishman will be primarily concerned with getting things done. The Frenchman will primarily seek to prepare an intellectual plan of action relating to the matter in hand. Culture gives to the nationality a distinct individuality which every member of the group seeks to emulate ; in the process he is drawn closer to the remaining members.

NEW MESSIAHS FOR OLD?

“ A few instances will suffice to illustrate the national character of art. The Spaniards are a nation of individualists. Their outlook on life and their conduct are characteristically individualistic. Spanish art possesses the imprint of this trait. Its music is almost entirely popular, and is intended for the most part to be sung, not by choirs or groups, but by single individuals. Its artists show similarity in their paintings. They do not create schools of art. Each one expresses his own individuality. The French are regarded as primarily intellectual in all things ; as men of thought, distinct from men of action. This intellectuality is a national characteristic, and it is reflected in the world of art of Frenchmen. The French artists attach special importance to order and composition, and tend to simplify and schematise. That is why they excel in black-and-white. The same tendency can be observed in French literature. Everything is conscious and according to previous plan.”

It is difficult to observe the decencies of argument when one is confronted with such generalisations. When a writer maintains that all Russians, or the majority of Russians, are morose ; that all Norwegians, or the majority of Norwegians, are silent ; that Spanish art is individual because the majority of Spaniards are individualists ; that the French are primarily intellectual in all things ; and that national cultures from these observations must be pre-eminently, intrinsically, and quintessentially immutable, one is left searching anxiously for parliamentary language in which to express one's disagreement. The assertion that there is only one localised area for each nation or race in the world in which it can express its corporate spirit is one that has only to be made for its incongruity to be established. Jewish culture need not cease to be individual in a Socialist country. Its features will, in all probability, change, but they need not necessarily become drab.

NEW MESSIAHS FOR OLD?

I think there can be no question that, of the three systems of government—Democracy, Fascism, and Communism—the only one that holds any hope of a peaceful solution for the conflicting claims of nationalism, for national minorities, and for Jews is the Socialist State.

It may well be said that this solution for the Jewish problem is as Utopian and idealistic as asking the Jews to wait for a Messianic redeemer. If Russian Jews have had their difficulties removed, what is to happen to the other thirteen million ? Jews, despite exaggerated stories of their international strength, can no more ensure the coming of Socialism than the Eskimos. And it is true that the coming of Socialism appears sometimes to be as long delayed as the coming of the Messiah. Nevertheless, a few practical results do emerge from this analysis.

NEW MESSIAHS FOR OLD?

If Socialism does not become the dominant political system of the world, the alternative, very conceivably, will be a series of devastating international wars in which even the stronghold of Socialism, Russia, will disappear. If civilisation crumbles, the fate of the Jews becomes of academic importance only, though I sometimes picture the survivors of such a world catastrophe meeting in solemn conclave to decide how they are to rid themselves of Jewish domination, and an equally solemn gathering of Jewish survivors elsewhere passing resolutions of protest !

It is difficult to see how, under any other scheme of things, the world can contain a variegated group of nations who will live harmoniously with each other. If the analysis of the reasons for anti-Semitism proves it to rest on class conflicts, the solution of the problem must be found in the classless society.

Jews may learn one lesson from this. Their task, as a corporate body, must be to pin their faith in those movements which have for their purpose the establishment of Socialism. From this it follows that salvation, as far as exclusively Jewish efforts are concerned, may be expected from the Jewish proletariat only. It is unlikely that we shall ever find the Jewish bourgeoisie, as a class, clamouring for Socialism.

NEW MESSIAHS FOR OLD?

I can well imagine timorous Jews repudiating such a course for Jewry on the ground that it would be providing their enemies with the battle-cry that Jews are revolutionaries. Since this is already a popular slogan, I doubt whether it would gain much more force. One may as well be hanged for a sheep as a lamb, and martyrdom is infinitely more becoming in a good cause.

However pessimistic our attitude may be as to the advent of Socialism, one thing is certain : Socialism will come before the Messiah. Even in England the happy day must arrive when an assembled committee formed of Sir Stafford Cripps, Mr. Harold Laski, Mr. G. D. H. Cole, and Sir Norman Angell finally succeed in persuading Sir Ernest Benn to record his vote for Socialism. With parliamentary democracy triumphant, the millennium will not be long delayed. We may yet see it officially welcomed in a speech by Mr. Ramsay MacDonald.

Of infinitely greater significance in this analysis is the moral for the individual Jew. I mentioned in an earlier chapter Dr. Weizmann's remark that German Jews do not know why they are being discriminated against. Obviously if a man is going to nurse a grievance, it is infinitely more satisfactory to understand why he does so. It may not be more comfortable in its results, but it permits the retention of dignity and self-respect. If Jews would realise that anti-Semitism constitutes one of the phases which is necessitated by the moulding of a new order of society they would be saved from the humiliating emotion of self-pity. Nor would it be necessary for them to take the advice of the Jewish Gandhis, who demand from them a return to what they call "essential Jewishness." Heaven knows what "essential Jewishness" implies. If it means that Jews are to crawl into a corner and try to persuade themselves that the rest of the world does not exist, they will perish, and, what is more, they will deserve to perish. The time is past when a group of people can wrap themselves in the shawl of their traditions and seek oblivion from the eager world around them.

NEW MESSIAHS FOR OLD?

Each Jew must learn that it is only in a clear appraisal of the whole of life that his own individual life takes on any significance. To imagine that a small section of the world's inhabitants can expect to gain security and freedom without allying itself to the numberless millions who must achieve the same object is a flightier essay in idealism than a belief in the coming of a Messiah.

NEW MESSIAHS FOR OLD?

I do not mean by this that the Jew should pretend that he is not a Jew. Few sights are less edifying than those members of the race who exhibit pained countenances when they are reminded that they are Jews. It may be that Heine was right when he said that Judaism was not a religion but a misfortune, but to construe this into justification for a feeling of inferiority is despicable. Being a Jew should not absolve a man from the necessity of criticising the world he lives in, nor should such criticism be ignored because it is made by a Jew. The inner peace which the Jew of an earlier period derived from an implicit faith in his religion can be replaced to-day only by a clear understanding of the forces which shape human destiny.

For Jews the implications of this analysis of anti-Semitism are evident. They are no less clear for non-Jews. If every Jew and Jewess in the world were destroyed, the motivating force responsible for anti-Semitism would still remain. The demand for uniformity is in itself a symptom of social disease. The desire for the familiar is an expression of the insecurity of a world in which man is pitted against man.

NEW MESSIAHS FOR OLD?

We shall understand and welcome individual and group variations only when we need no longer fear them. It is not faith in God we need so much as faith in man.

I repeat that anti-Semitism is an index of class unrest. Its appearance in the life of a people is a clear indication of the necessity for an overhaul of their social institutions.

It is a warning sign which, if ignored, means not only the discomfiture of Jews, but stagnation in the life of non-Jews. When Dean Inge warns anti-Semites that the Jews have stood by the graves of all their oppressors, he is thinking in terms of Divine revenge. But this is a misconception. The material greatness of Spain deteriorated, not because she provoked Divine anger in expelling her Jews, but because in ridding herself of them she destroyed a bourgeois element which was hated because it was in conflict with the established order, though it subsequently transformed the structure of other European States. Feudalism triumphed, but only at the cost of the subsequent decay and isolation of Spain.

If a Fascist régime plunges Germany into war, and in so doing destroys whatever is valuable in German civilisation, it will not be a judgment of God, but the inevitable penalty for ignoring the necessity for a change in economic structure, of which the German hatred of Jews was a warning signal. It is not because they love Jews that the Communists in Russia regard an outbreak of anti-Semitism as a serious calamity, but because they recognise it as a symptom of a graver underlying disease.

NEW MESSIAHS FOR OLD?

There is so much to do in this world that it is time we laid aside the playthings of our childhood. Race-hatred is a relic of our stupid past, and race glorification is merely a modern variation of an ancient folly. This does not mean that we shall rid ourselves of these vanities by fine phrases and after-dinner speeches, but it does postulate a study of present reality in the light of the reality of the past.

THE END

